PREFACE.

SINCE the publication of the REVISED EDITION OF WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY in 1847, the purpose has been kept steadily in view to prepare another edition embracing all the alterations and improvements which the progress of the language and the additional facilities for improving its Lexicography might seem to require. The late Professor GOODRICH had, from the first, directed his attention to the collection of words not inserted in the previous edition, and to the preparation of definitions of meanings which had been overlooked, or were made necessary by new applications of words in the writings of respectable authors, and by the progress of Science and the Arts.

Many of these words and definitions were given to the public in the Pictorial Edition of 1859, together with numerous illustrative wood-cuts. To these was added a large collection of discriminated Synonyms, which had been carefully prepared by Professor Goodrich. This Edition was, however, a provisional one, designed to serve only until the more careful and thorough revision, which had been so long in contemplation, could be perfected.

In preparing for the present revision, the attention of both the Editor and the Publishers was first directed to the Etymology. They were aware that, however admirable the industry and valuable the contributions of Dr. WEBSTER in this department, the science of comparative Philology was by no means perfect in his time, if indeed it could be said to exist at all. It is only within a very few years that the true principles on which this science rests have been suggested and confirmed, and the methods have been determined by which future investigations may be successfully prosecuted. It seemed necessary, first of all, that these new principles and methods should be applied in the entire revision of the Etymologies of Dr. Webster, by a scholar who had made Etymology his special study. In 1854, arrangements were made with Dr. C. A. F. MAHN, of Berlin, Prussia, to undertake this task. Dr. Mahn was recommended by some of the most distinguished scholars of Germany as admirably qualified for the service, and he had been favorably known by special researches in this department. He has employed several years upon the work, and has performed it in a manner worthy of his high reputation. The results are submitted to all persons who are interested in philological studies, with the belief that they will find in them a new and valuable contribution to the stores of linguistic knowledge. This feature of the present edition will, it is thought, be acknowledged by all scholars as one of marked superiority, and will be gratefully welcomed by the now very large number of instructors and studious persons who are interested in acquiring a more thorough knowledge of the English language.

Professor JAMES D. DANA, of Yale College, had been engaged, at an early date, to revise the definitions in Geology, Natural History, etc., and the revision in these and some kindred departments has been completed by him, or has passed under his careful scrutiny.

The work of revising the definitions of the principal words occasioned great and perplexing difficulties to Professor Goodrich and those with whom he conferred. He was well aware of the defective method which had been adopted by Dr. JOHNSON, of defining words by enumerating and explaining their special applications rather than by developing their broadly-distinguished meanings; and he knew that in this Johnson had furnished the model for most, if not all, of the defining dictionaries of the English language which have since been published. Dr. Webster, in his strictures on Johnson's Dictionary, noticed, as one of its defects, that the author had, in many cases, failed to exhibit full and explicated definitions of important significations. This fault Dr. Webster endeavored to avoid, and with manifest success. His own definitions are superior to those of Johnson in fullness and precision, as well as in the greater copiousness and appropriateness of illustrative phrases. But he had not emancipated himself entirely from the influence of Johnson's example in accumulating definitions that are really the same, though at first sight they may appear to be different. Dr. Webster insists, also, with earnestness, that it is the duty of the lexicographer to give first the primitive signification of every word, and to develop and arrange the dependent meanings in the order in which they were derived. But his theory in respect to these and other points was better than his practice. Of these and other imperfections in Dr. Webster's definitions, Professor Goodrich was fully aware. He was also aware that the dictionaries of many other languages, both ancient and modern, had been constructed on a better theory and after better methods. He had formed for himself a conception, more or less distinct, of the proper method of exhibiting and illustrating the definitions of the leading words. But it seemed to him an Herculean task to undertake to revise the work of Dr. Webster, and he was reluctant to assume the labor and responsibility which it involved. At last, with enfeebled bodily strength, he consented to enter upon a tentative process in connection with able and experienced associates. These associates were, at first, Mr. WILLIAM G. WEBSTER, the Rev. CHAUNCEY GOODRICH, and Professor CHESTER S. LYMAN, of Yale College, all of whom had been employed in preparing the Pictorial Edition. Only repeated trials could satisfy so conscientious a lexicographer as Professor Goodrich in respect to the best plan of subjecting to new forms of expression the mass of valuable matter accumulated by Dr Webster, and of re-arranging it according to more approved methods. The undertaking involved so much labor, and required changes so extensive and material, that Professor WILLIAM D. WHITNEY and Professor DANIEL C GILMAN, both of Yale College, were soon added to the corps of associates To these gentlemen was assigned the special duty of suggesting the changes and modifications which seemed to be required in the definitions of the principal words, their suggestions being submitted to Professor Goodrich for his judgment and decision. Under this arrangement, the work of experiment was going on till the death of Professor Goodrich This untoward event occurred, however, before the experiment had been carried so far as to determine how much it was desirable to attempt in the way of recasting the definitions, or how much it was practicable to accomplish.

After the death of Professor Goodrich, in 1860, the direction of the work of revision was committed to Professor NOAH PORTER, who had been intimately acquainted with his views ever since the publication of the Revised Edition of 1847, and had frequently conferred with him in respect to the excellences and the defects of that edition, as well as the methods by which these defects might be remedied Before the present revision was undertaken, Professor Porter had communicated in writing his views of the changes which ought to be made in the matter and form of the Dictionary; and, with a full knowledge of these views, Professor Goodrich had earnestly solicited him to undertake the entire responsibility and direction of the work When the proposal was renewed by the proprietors of the copyright and by the family of Dr Webster, it could not easily be declined, for it was enforced by considerations of affection and of duty both to the living and to the dead. But the service was assumed by him with great reluctance, as being foreign to his special studies, and incompatible with very pressing occupations. At the urgent solicitation of his valued friends the publishers, as well as of the family interested, and of his beloved associate, the late EDWARD C HERRICK, — whose acquaintance with the Dictionary, and whose interest in it, extended back to the publication of the first edition in 1828, — he at first consented to undertake a general superintendence of the revision, but soon, by the force of circumstances, was constrained to bestow upon it a more minute attention The collaborators already named continued their services to the end, and others were from time to time employed for a longer or a shorter period

The following persons have been actively engaged in the preparation of the work. Mr. WILLIAM G WEBSTER, — who has for many years labored in this field, first in connection with his honored father, and subsequently with Professor Goodrich, — has represented the views of his father and of the family, in respect to all questions of doubt or difficulty, and has also attended to the syllabication of the words, the determination of the accents, and the marking of the pronunciation. Professors WILLIAM D WHITNEY and DANIEL C GILMAN have labored at the definitions of the principal words, recasting, re-arranging, and condensing them, introducing citations, &c.; their work, in all cases, having been sanctioned or revised by the Editor. Professor CHESTER S. LYMAN has given his attention chiefly to the terms in Mathematics, Physics, Technology, and Machinery, with the exception of those relating to the Steam-engine and to Railways These last have been carefully defined, and in some cases furnished, by ALEXANDER L HOLLEY, Esq, an eminent Civil Engineer of New York, who has also contributed many original and valuable drawings for the illustrative woodcuts. Captain WILLIAM P CRAIGHILL, of the United States Engineers, recently Assistant Professor of Military and Civil Engineering and the Science of War, in the Military Academy at West Point, has given a like attention to the terms in Military Science, Engineering, and Gunnery, furnishing original drawings when necessary It has already been stated that Professor JAMES D DANA had several years since been employed in the departments of Geology, Natural History, etc, to prepare new definitions, to recast the old, and to select new words. At his suggestion, WILLIAM C. MINOR, M D, was employed to render assistance in these departments, and he has labored with great ability and zeal in connection with Professor Dana, who has, in every instance, carefully reviewed and expressly sanctioned his work The terms pertaining to Musical Science and Art were chiefly prepared or revised by LOWELL MASON, Esq, of New York; but many of the articles were written by JOHN S. DWIGHT, Esq., of Boston. In Physiology and Medical Science, Professor R CRESSON STILES, M D., has furnished many carefully considered definitions and emendations. The Hon. J C. PERKINS, of Salem, Massachusetts, who has had long experience as editor of various law publications, has, with great labor and care, revised the terms of Law and Jurisprudence. He has aimed to phrase these definitions in the more exact language which is required by the advance of Legal Science, and to support them by copious references to legal authorities. E B. O'CALLAGHAN, S. J., of Albany, has revised and rewritten the definitions of such terms as have a special meaning in the Roman Catholic Church. It having been deemed desirable slightly to condense some of the etymological articles furnished by Dr. Mahn, and to translate portions of them into English, this work was committed to the care of Mr. EUGENE SCHUYLER, under the direction of Professor JAMES HADLEY, of Yale College. The derivation of a number of words of Indian origin has been furnished by the Hon.

J. Hammond Trumbull, of Hartford, well known as a learned and accurate student of the aboriginal languages of America.

To the Rev. Chauncey Goodrich was committed the very important duty of receiving the mass of material furnished by the most of the assistants who have been named, verifying its accuracy, and then incorporating it into the final copy for the printer. In this work he was assisted for several months by the Rev. Fisk P. Brewer and the Rev. John M. Morris. Mr. Goodrich has also revised or prepared many of the definitions in Agriculture and Horticulture, in Antiquities and Architecture, in Biblical matters and Ecclesiastical History, in Commerce, Domestic Economy, and the Fine Arts, making use of the best authorities in each of these departments. He has also brought to the service the results of his own experience while laboring under his father's guidance, and the remembrance of his father's views and wishes in respect to many important details.

It was thought desirable, in order to secure the greatest possible accuracy and perfection to the copy, to place it for further revision in the hands of some scholar of critical habits and approved experience, who had not been concerned in its earlier preparation. Accordingly, Mr. William A. Whitte r was employed for this service, and also to correct the proof-sheets; and with him was associated, at a later period, Mr. Arthur W. Wright. Mr. Wheeler was also employed in various other services hereafter to be named; and he has furnished especially valuable contributions from his ample literary stores, and given the work throughout the benefit of his exact learning and his nice discrimination. Mr. William G. Webster shared with Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Wright the responsibility of correcting the proofs. Mr. Samuel Porter, of Hartford, besides reading a portion of the first proofs, has examined with great care the final or plate proofs; and the Dictionary is much the better for his detection of oversights, and for the alterations he has suggested. Valuable assistance has been received from various persons connected with the Boston Stereotype Foundry, especially from Mr. Thomas Holt, the Reader of the establishment, whose taste, experience, conscientious fidelity, and accurate but unpretending scholarship, have materially benefited the work.

The preparation of the Appendix was intrusted almost entirely to the supervision of Mr. Wheeler, who has read every page of it with critical care. The "Pronouncing Vocabulary of Scripture Names" was wholly prepared by him, and he constructed the very interesting and valuable "Vocabulary of the Names of Noted Fictitious Persons, Places, Etc." The full and accurate "Pronouncing Vocabulary of Greek and Latin Proper Names," was prepared with much labor and care by Professor Thomas A. Thacher, of Yale College. The "Pronouncing Vocabularies of Modern Geographical and Biographical Names" are the work of Dr. Joseph Thomas, of Philadelphia, the well-known editor of Lippincott's Pronouncing Gazetteer of the World, and his name will be a sufficient guaranty for their trustworthiness and value. The "Etymological Vocabulary of Modern Geographical Names" was prepared by the Rev. Charles H. Wheeler, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, who also prepared the Explanatory Vocabulary of Christian Names, from materials furnished in part by Charles J. Lukens, Esq., of Philadelphia. The Table of "Arbitrary Signs used in Writing and Printing" was originally prepared by Professor Lyman, and has been revised for this edition by Mr. Wright and Mr. William A. Wheeler. Mr. William G. Webster, with the assistance of several of the other collaborators, has revised and greatly improved the list of "Abbreviations and Contractions used in Writing and Printing," and the list of "Quotations, Words, Phrases, Proverbs, etc., from the Greek, the Latin, and Modern Foreign Languages," which were originally compiled by him. A particular account of the various vocabularies will be found in the general Preface to the Appendix, and in the special Prefaces to the vocabularies themselves.

The elaborate and learned Introduction to the previous editions has been omitted. It is not without regret that this venerable memorial of the enterprise, the sagacity, and the scholarship of Dr. Webster, has been displaced to make room for new matter more in accordance with the advance of Philological Science and the wants of the present generation. To supply its place, Professor James Hadley has contributed "A Brief History of the English Language," designed to show its philological relations, and to trace the progress and influence of the causes which have brought it to its present condition. Professor Hadley has also contributed his advice in respect to numerous questions philological and general, which were constantly arising, and has given his sanction to the principles and aims that have guided the Editor and his collaborators in the changes which have been adopted in this edition.

The Preface of the Editor of the Revised Edition of 1847, the Preface of the Author to the original edition of 1828, and the Memoir of Dr. Webster by Professor Goodrich, are all retained in this edition, as containing some important details of literary history, and as furnishing a concise statement of the principles which were adopted in the preparation of the successive editions of the work.

The "Principles of Pronunciation," originally prepared by Professor Goodrich for the edition of 1859, have been carefully revised and much expanded by Mr. Wheeler, whose attention had been previously directed to this subject in the preparation of "A Manual of English Pronunciation and Spelling" (Boston, 1861). Mr. Wheeler has also revised and much enlarged the "Synopsis of Words Differently Pronounced by Different Orthoepists," which was originally prepared by Dr. Joseph E. Worcester, and inserted in the Octavo Abridgment of Webster's "American Dictionary," and which was afterward revised by Professor Goodrich.

Besides the persons already named in connection with the special services which they have rendered, a large number of persons have contributed important materials and suggestions to the principal collaborators. Among these, particular mention should be made of Mr. H. S. DANA, of Woodstock, Vermont, who furnished a large and critically selected list of words and readings from the dramatic and other writers of the age of Queen Elizabeth. For the abundant and varied collection of illustrative passages and citations which were at the service of the Revisers, they are indebted to the zeal and painstaking of many devoted "readers" for the Dictionary, not a few of the most faithful and judicious of whom were ladies.

To the Hon. GEORGE P. MARSH, the Editor is under obligations for some valuable suggestions in respect to the principles which should be followed in the preparation of a popular English Dictionary.

It is not practicable to enumerate here the works contained in the library of authorities furnished to the Editor and his associates by the enlightened enterprise of the publishers. As this Dictionary was designed to be not merely a compilation, but a digest of results obtained by independent research, comparatively few references are made to other Dictionaries and Encyclopedias. But the best works of the kind have been freely consulted, and, among them, the well-known Dictionary of Dr. Joseph E. Worcester, which is so honorable to the industry of the author and the scholarship of the country.

The features of the present Edition which deserve to be specially enumerated are the following: —

I. The Revised Etymology. This feature has already been noticed. It is believed that critical readers will acknowledge the learning, the brevity, the sound judgment, the self-explaining order, and the minutely-traced ramifications, which characterize these etymologies, and it is hoped that they will attract the attention and stimulate the studies of all who desire to know more of the varied history of their mother-tongue.

II. The Revised Definitions. The definitions of the principal words, not scientific or technical, have been carefully elaborated by Professors Whitney and Gilman, each possessing peculiar qualifications, and each performing his work as thoroughly as was possible within the limits prescribed. Their work was carefully reviewed by the Editor before it was admitted into the copy. The rule which he adopted for his own guidance was freely to accept and make any change in the matter and the language of the previous edition which he had reason to suppose would be desired by Dr. Webster himself, were he now living, and fully possessed of the principles which have been universally accepted by modern philologists and lexicographers, or which Professor Goodrich would have sanctioned, had he been able to give to the work of revision the full measure of his well-known energy and sagacious judgment. In accordance with this rule, great pains have been taken, 1. To contract and condense the definitions into as few general heads, or numbered divisions, as was practicable. In this the example of Dr. Goodrich, in his experimental work, was followed, and the Revisers have sought to avoid all redundancy and tautology, to strike out all mere enumerations of particular applications of meanings, and to reduce the number of illustrative phrases to the actual wants of the reader. While they have been thus bold on the one hand, they have been studiously careful, on the other, to retain the exact language of the earlier edition, in every case possible, esteeming very highly Dr. Webster's plain and clearly-expressed definitions for their own sake as well as for that of the author, and preferring to err on the side of cautious reverence rather than on that of thoughtless innovation. In many cases in which the numbered articles under a word have been diminished, it will be found that the number of real definitions has been materially increased, and that the gathering of them into fewer groups has contributed to their more easy comprehension and more ready use. A single article often includes a group of kindred meanings, and thus enables the reader to view at a glance their close relation and similarity, and to trace out the subtle movement of thought by which one was evolved from another. Often, too, a well-chosen citation from a good author has been preferred, as a means of definition, to an explanatory circumlocution. 2. An effort has been constantly made to develop and arrange the several meanings and groups of meanings in the order of their actual growth and history, beginning, if possible, with the primitive signification, as indicated by the etymology. As this, for many reasons, has now become possible in numerous cases in which it was impossible in the time of Dr. Webster, and as, in many instances, Dr. Webster did not perfect this order when the materials were within his reach, it has been often found necessary, in the present edition, to change the arrangement of the definitions. Special consideration has been given to this point in view of the fact that the study, or even the casual notice, of the order of growth in the meanings of single words, is a stimulant of thought, and the habitual attention to it is of itself an education. 3. Many new meanings have been added, either as they have been brought to light by an extended examination of authors in the earlier and later periods of English literature, or as they have occurred to the Revisers in performing their work, or have been suggested by the kindness of critical and thoughtful friends.

III. The Illustrative Citations. Special effort has been made to obtain illustrative passages from classical English writers, both old and new. In order to collect such passages, and also to discover words and meanings that had been omitted in other English Dictionaries, a systematized plan was devised by which a large number of works in all departments of literature were carefully read by many competent persons, and a copious collection of illustrative passages was placed at the disposal of the Revisers. The principal dramatic authors, and various prose writers, of the age of Queen Elizabeth, were read with care by Mr. H. S. Dana. The plays of Shakespeare and the poetry of Milton were carefully studied by the aid of the excellent Concordances of Mrs. Mary Cowden Clarke and Mr. Guy Lushington Prendergast, with particular reference to any special usage which these poets have sanctioned. The most prominent in the long series of English writers, down to the latest, have been read for the purpose of selecting illustrations, especially those writers whose use of language is particularly idiomatic or classical. Sir Walter Scott, Southey, Coleridge, Lamb, Byron, Washington Irving, De Quincey, Macaulay, Tennyson, Hawthorne, and many others, have received as much attention as the older writers. A comparatively small portion only of the passages which were marked and copied has been actually used, it being thought undesirable to multiply such passages when they were required for no valuable end. In cases where to cite a passage would serve no purpose in illustrating a meaning or justifying the use of a word, the name only of the author has been given, provided, as in the case of words obsolete or not now approved, the authority of some writer was deemed desirable. The free use of this large and varied collection of citations will, it is thought, add greatly to the value and interest of the present edition. It is believed that no dictionary of the language contains so many apt illustrations from so large a variety of writers. The citations which have been retained from the preceding editions, as well as those introduced for the first time, have, as far as possible, been verified and copied with scrupulous care. Such passages were preferred as would throw additional light upon the definitions, or as possessed any interest of thought or of language.

IV. The Vocabulary. No pains have been spared to introduce additional words, provided they were of such a character as to deserve insertion. At the same time, the Revisers have been actuated by no desire to swell the list to the greatest possible number. Words which were the offspring of the individual conceit of a whimsical or lawless writer, which did not conform to the analogies of the language, and which were never accepted or approved by good writers, of their own or a subsequent generation, have not been admitted. On the other hand, new words which have been acknowledged and approved as good have been carefully garnered, whether used by old authors or new. A great number of obsolete or obsolescent words, which were once accepted and freely used, have been recovered by the readings and researches that were directed in part to this end. Self-explaining compounds have been designedly omitted by hundreds, if not by thousands, while care has been taken to introduce and explain all those which need to be defined. It will be observed, however, that this edition differs from the former editions in following a strictly alphabetical arrangement of all such words. The participles, participial adjectives, and verbal nouns in most cases do not appear in the vocabulary as separate words, but are given under the verbs from which they are formed, and which explain their meaning. But the participial adjectives and verbal nouns have a separate place and treatment, in those cases in which they have obtained a meaning different from that which they derive from the verbs to which they belong. The principal parts of the verbs, regular and irregular, are given together, within brackets, under the verb, instead of being entered and defined separately. But the principal parts of the irregular verbs are usually inserted in their proper alphabetical places, with a simple cross-reference to the verbs themselves. A similar course has been pursued in regard to the comparative and superlative degrees of many adjectives, and the irregular plurals of nouns. The vocabulary, as a whole, though not constructed for any display of enumerated titles, will be found to be greatly increased and enriched. It comprises an aggregate of upward of 114,000 words.

V. The Scientific and Technical Definitions have been carefully revised and elaborated by very able gentlemen, and with the aid of the best authorities. Many of the articles, it is believed, will command confidence and merit commendation for their scientific value, while their brevity and plain language fit them for the use and instruction of all classes.

VI. The Collection of Synonyms, so carefully prepared by Professor Goodrich, has, with a few slight changes, been incorporated into the body of the work for greater facility of reference. The number of the words thus defined and distinguished is far greater than the number of separate articles would seem to indicate. The meanings are thoroughly discriminated in every case, the words being traced from their etymology, and explained by formal definitions, as well as illustrated by contrasted examples of their various use. In addition, copious lists of synonymous or interchangeable terms have been attached to most of the important words, for the convenience of teachers and inexperienced writers.

VII. The Pictorial Illustrations, more than three thousand in number, have been inserted in the body of the work; in the previous edition they were printed as an appendix to the volume, but it was thought it would be an improvement to place them under the words which they illustrate, so as to avoid the necessity of any further reference, and it is hoped that the advantages of the present arrangement will be appreciated. It will be observed that an entirely new selection of illustrations has been made for this edition, many being taken from original drawings, and the remainder chiefly from works of high authority in their respective departments. For the artistic beauty of these cuts, the work is indebted to Mr. JOHN ANDREW, of Boston, who has a distinguished reputation as an engraver on wood. It will be remembered that only a partial selection could be made of objects to be illustrated. Even in illustrated works on Natural History, it is customary to represent only a limited number of objects; and, in a work like the present, a still smaller number of such illustrations could be admitted. The general aim has been to illustrate those objects of which a drawing would convey a better conception than a mere verbal description. Those who use the Dictionary will not fail to observe that, to many words which are not themselves illustrated, there are subjoined references to illustrations given in connection with other words; as, under Withers, it is said, "[See Illust. of Horse.]"

VIII. The Vocabularies in the Appendix have been re-edited, or expressly prepared for this edition by able scholars, as will appear from the full account of the Vocabularies themselves, and of the researches and aims of the authors in the special Introductions which accompany them. The first and most prominent, the "Vocabulary of the Names of Noted Fictitious Persons, Places, Etc.," by Mr Wheeler, is a novel and appropriate accompaniment of an English Dictionary It is the first attempt of the kind, at least in our language, and is valuable for its interesting gleanings from history and biography, as well as for its explanations of many obscure allusions in the best and most popular writers The remaining Vocabularies are all the products of original and laborious research, or are trustworthy compilations from the best sources

IX. The Pronunciation of English words has been carefully attended to in this edition. The principles adopted are stated at length and fully illustrated in the article on the Principles of Pronunciation, which was originally prepared by Professor Goodrich, and has been elaborated by Mr Wheeler, with suggestions from able scholars, who, as well as himself, have made a special study of English orthoepy and the science of phonology. A more thoroughly practical and satisfactory treatment of the subject, the Editor confidently believes, can not be found in the language. The "Synopsis of Words Differently Pronounced by Different Orthoepists" will be found to be a comprehensive, practical, and fully trustworthy exhibition of the various modes of pronunciation given in the best English Dictionaries. The pronunciation of each word in the Dictionary is indicated by the marked or figured Key which is to be found at the bottom of the page This Key has been remodeled and arranged with special reference to this edition, and contains some few characters additional to those of the Key previously used. The number of characters now employed is thought to be as large as is desirable To attempt more is to seem to promise more than it is practicable to perform, and is, besides, open to the objection that a complex notation would not be readily understood

X The Orthography In this department no change has been made in the principles adopted and clearly set forth in the Revised Edition of 1847, and so generally accepted by the American public In a few classes of words the Dictionary recommends and follows the peculiar modes of spelling which Dr Webster introduced for the sake of carrying out the acknowledged analogies of the language — modes of spelling, which, in every instance, had been previously suggested by distinguished English grammarians and writers on orthography, such as Lowth, Walker, &c., and the propriety of which has been recognized by Smart and other recent English lexicographers But to remove every reasonable ground of complaint against the Dictionary in regard to this matter, an alternative orthography is now given in almost every case, the old style of spelling being subjoined to the reformed or new. In two or three instances it has been found that the forms introduced by Dr Webster, or to which he lent his sanction, were based upon a mistaken etymology; and therefore these forms have been set aside, and the old spelling has been restored. Preceding this account are some Observations on the general subject of Orthography, with copious "Rules for Spelling Certain Classes of Words," prepared by Mr Wright, followed by "A List of Words Spelled in Two or More Ways," compiled expressly for the present edition. These new features give this edition of the Dictionary a great superiority over the former editions

In conclusion, the Editor desires to express his thanks to all the persons who have assisted in the preparation of the present edition, for the fidelity and perseverance with which they have discharged their duties. It is to their industry, scholarship, and zeal, that the peculiar excellences of this edition are chiefly to be ascribed. Though the Editor is more sensible of its deficiencies than any other person can be, yet he does not hesitate to commend it to the public for the improvements which are due to the thorough research and careful attention which have been bestowed by his associates in preparing it. To them the public owe a debt of grateful appreciation, which, he believes, will be cheerfully discharged.

"There is no knowledge of things conveyed by men's words, when their ideas agree not to the reality of things . He that hath names without ideas, wants meaning in his words, and speaks only empty sounds . . The only sure way of making known the signification of the name of any simple idea, is by presenting to his senses that subject which may produce it in his mind, and make him actually have the idea that word stands for . The shape of a horse, or cassowary, will be but rudely and imperfectly imprinted on the mind by words, the sight of the animals doth it a thousand times better It is not unreasonable to propose that words standing for things which are known and distinguished by their outward shapes should be expressed by little draughts and prints made of them . . Naturalists, that treat of plants and animals, have found the benefit of this way, and he that has had occasion to consult them will have reason to confess that he has a clearer idea of apium or ibex, from a little print of that herb or beast, than he could have from a long definition of the names of either of them And so, no doubt, he would have of strigil and sistrum, if, instead of curry-comb and cymbal, which are the English names dictionaries render them by, he could see stamped in the margin small pictures of these instruments, as they were in use among the ancients . Such things as these, which the eye distinguishes by their shapes, would be best let into the mind by draughts made of them, and more determine the signification of such words than any other words set for them, or made use of to define them"

Locke on the Human Understanding.

EDITOR'S PREFACE TO THE REVISED EDITION OF 1847.

THE demand for THE AMERICAN DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE has increased so rapidly within a few years past, that the publishers have felt the necessity of its being stereotyped, for the greater convenience of the public, in a single quarto volume. In deciding upon this measure, they were desirous that the work should be thoroughly revised anew, and that each department which it embraces should be brought down, as far as possible, to the latest advances of science, literature, and the arts, at the present day. With this view, it was placed in the hands of the Rev. CHAUNCEY A. GOODRICH, Professor in Yale College, as one of the members of Dr. WEBSTER'S family, in the expectation of his obtaining such additional aid as might be necessary for the accomplishment of this design. The Editor has not acted, however, upon his own personal responsibility in executing this trust. He has, from time to time, laid open the sheets to the inspection of the other members of the family, and no important alterations have been made, especially in any of the leading characteristics of the work, except with the concurrence, or at the request, of Dr. Webster's legal representatives. In laying before the public an edition thus prepared, the fruit of nearly three years of care and attention, the Editor will be expected to make some brief statement of the principles on which he has conducted the revision, and the result of his labors, as exhibited in the present volume.

This work was first published, in two quarto volumes, in the year 1828. At the expiration of twelve years, or in the years 1840–1, a second edition was published by the Author, in two royal octavo volumes. Of this he thus speaks in the Advertisement prefixed. "The improvements in this edition of the AMERICAN DICTIONARY consist chiefly in the addition of several thousand words to the vocabulary, the division of words into syllables, and the correction of definitions in several of the sciences, which are made conformable to recent discoveries and classifications. For the latter improvements, the Author is indebted chiefly to Professor TULLY, of the Medical College in New Haven. To these improvements may be added the introduction and explanation of many phrases from foreign languages, frequently used by English authors, and in conversation, and also of many foreign terms used in books of music." In conducting this revision, Dr. Webster was aided in some part of his labors by his son, WILLIAM G. WEBSTER, Esq., of New Haven; who, also, at a subsequent period, prepared the revised Addenda, under the direction of his father. The later improvements of the Author, down to the period of his death, are here inserted under their proper heads, from the manuscripts which he left. By these successive revisions, and the one which has now been made, new matter, to the amount of more than three hundred pages, has been added to the work, all of which, by the use of a smaller type, and by careful compression, is now brought within the compass of this volume. Of the course pursued in the revision it will now be proper briefly to speak.

In respect to the Etymologies, the Editor has not considered it as lying within his province to make any material alterations. In a very few cases of obvious necessity, some slight change has been made. But the chief labor, in reference to this part of the work, has been bestowed on the difficult task of giving with accuracy the numerous words from Oriental and foreign languages, which are used in tracing the origin of our own.

The chief value of a dictionary consists in its Definitions—in giving a clear, full, and accurate exhibition of all the various shades of meaning which belong, by established usage, to the words of a language. It is in this respect, especially, that Dr. Webster's Dictionary has been generally considered superior to every other, both of this country and of England. To this point, therefore, the labors of the Editor have been mainly directed. No efforts have been spared to obtain the most recent and valuable works, not only in lexicography, but in the various departments of science and the arts embraced in the American Dictionary. As these subjects are in a state of continual progress, every important word, in its various applications, has been diligently examined and compared with the statements made on each topic, by the latest and most approved authorities. Smart's English Dictionary, in the edition of 1846, has been carefully collated with this work, and also the unfinished one [Craig's], in a course of publication by Gilbert, so far as the numbers have appeared. Reference has likewise constantly been made to Richardson's Dictionary,—although this had been previously examined by Dr. Webster,—and also to the Analytical Dictionary of Booth. Each of the articles in Brande's Encyclopedia of Science, Literature, and Art, has been collated with the corresponding portions of this Dictionary, as the starting-point, when necessary, of investigation in larger treatises. The Penny Cyclopedia has been consulted at every step, especially in matters of science; and the Encyclopædia Americana (based on the German Conversations-Lexikon) has been relied upon, particularly on subjects of continental literature, philosophy, history, art, &c. In order to secure greater accuracy, numerous special dictionaries or vocabularies, confined to some single department, have also been collated with this work, and the ablest treatises on important branches of science and art have been diligently examined. In architecture, the chief reliance has been placed on the Oxford Glossary of Architecture (1845), and the Encyclopedia of Architecture (1842), by Gwilt, author of the articles on this subject in Brande's Encyclopedia. In agriculture Johnson's Farmer's Encyclopedia (1844), and Gardner's Farmer's Dictionary (1846), have been chiefly used. In general antiquities, the large treatise of Fosbroke has been frequently consulted, while in classical antiquities the principal reliance has been placed on the recent Dictionary of Smith (1846), as a work of the highest authority. In respect to the antiquities of the church, the elaborate work of Coleman (1841) has been frequently consulted, and Hook's Church Dictionary (1844) has been collated throughout, with reference to the rites, ceremonies, vestments, &c., of the church of England, and also of the Roman Catholic and Greek churches. In botany, use has principally been made of the writings of Lindley and Loudon. In natural history, Partington's British Cyclopedia of Natural History (1835–7), and Jardine's Naturalist's Library (1834–43), have been much consulted, in connection with the articles on these subjects in the Penny Cyclopedia and similar works. In geology, mineralogy, and some associated branches of natural history, Humble's Dictionary of terms in these departments (1840) has been compared with this work throughout. In respect to mercantile subjects, banking, coins, weights, measures, &c., McCulloch's Commercial Dictionary (1845) has been collated at every step, as the standard work on these subjects. In manufactures and the arts, Dr. Ure's Dictionary of Manufactures, Arts, and Mines, with its Supplement (1845), has been relied upon as of the highest authority. In engineering and mechanical philosophy, Hebert's Engineer's and Mechanic's Cyclopedia (1842) has been carefully collated, with a constant reference to the more popular and recent Dictionaries of Francis, Grier, and Buchanan, in the editions of 1846. In seamanship, the Dictionary of Marine Terms, in Lieutenant Totten's Naval Text-Book (1841), has been taken as a guide. In military affairs, the Dictionary of Campbell (1844) has been followed, in connection with the more extended articles contained in Brande and the Penny Cyclopedia, on the kindred topics. In the fine arts, much use has been made of the Dictionary of Elmes. In domestic economy, the Encyclopedia of Webster and Parkes on this subject, (1841) has furnished many important statements, on a great variety of topics, presented for the first time in a scientific form, and to this has been added Cooley's Cyclopedia of Practical Receipts (1846), as exhibiting much collateral information in respect to the arts, manufactures, and trades. Such, in general, are the authorities which have been relied on in this revision.

But it is obviously impossible for any one mind to embrace with accuracy all the various departments of knowledge which are now brought within the compass of a dictionary. Hence arise most of the errors and inconsistencies which abound in works of this kind. To avoid these as far as possible, especially in matters of science, the Editor at first made an arrangement with Dr. JAMES G. PERCIVAL, who had rendered important assistance to Dr. Webster in the edition of 1828, to take the entire charge of revising the scientific articles embraced in this work. This revision, however, owing to causes beyond the control of either party, was extended to but little more than two letters of the alphabet, and the Editor then obtained the assistance of his associates in office, and of other gentlemen in various professional employments. To these he would now return his acknowledgments for the aid they have afforded. The articles on law have been collated with Blackstone, and with Bouvier's Law Dictionary, by the Hon. ELIZUR GOODRICH, formerly Professor of Law in Yale College, and the errors discovered, which were few in number, have been carefully corrected. The departments of ecclesiastical history and ancient philosophy have been thoroughly revised by the Rev. JAMES MURDOCK, D. D., late Professor in the Andover Theological Seminary, who has furnished, in many instances, new and valuable definitions. The terms in chemistry have been submitted to Professor SILLIMAN, of Yale College, and whatever changes were requisite in the explanations have been made under his direction. In the departments of botany, anatomy, physiology, medicine, and some branches of natural history, Dr. Webster received assistance, in the revision of 1840, as mentioned above, from Dr. WILLIAM TULLY, late Professor in the Medical Institution of Yale College. Still further aid has been received from the same source in the present revision, and much of the accuracy of this work, in these branches, will be found owing to the valuable assistance he has thus afforded. On topics connected with Oriental literature, aid has frequently been obtained from Professor GIBBS, of Yale College. A part of the articles on astronomy, meteorology, and natural philosophy, in the edition of 1828, passed under the revision of Professor OLMSTED, of Yale College. This revision has now been extended to all the articles on these subjects throughout the work, and new definitions have been furnished in numerous instances. The definitions in mathematics, after having been compared with those given in the Dictionaries of Hutton and of Barlow, have been submitted to Professor STANLEY, of Yale College, and the alterations have, in all cases, been made under his direction. In the sciences of geology and mineralogy, a thorough revision of the whole volume has been made by JAMES D. DANA, Esq., Geologist and Mineralogist of the United States Exploring Expedition, and associate editor of the American Journal of Science and Arts, to whom the Editor is likewise indebted for assistance on various other subjects, which has greatly enhanced the value of the work. In practical astronomy, and the science of entomology, aid has been frequently received from EDWARD C. HERRICK, Esq., Librarian of Yale College. The articles on painting and the fine arts have, to a great extent, passed under the inspection of NATHANIEL JOCELYN, Esq., Painter, of New Haven, and new definitions have in many cases been furnished.

A correspondence has likewise been carried on with literary friends in England, and especially with one of the contributors to the Penny Cyclopedia, with a view to obtain information on certain points, in respect to which nothing definite could be learned from any books within the reach of the Editor. Extended lists of words have been transmitted for examination, and returned with ample notes and explanations. Much obscurity has thus been removed in respect to the use of terms which have a peculiar sense in England, especially some of frequent occurrence at the universities, in the circles of trade, and in the familiar intercourse of life. To the friends who have given them assistance in these various departments the Editor would return his cordial thanks. Whatever improvement the work may have gained from this revision, in respect to clearness, accuracy, and fullness of definition, will be found owing, in a great degree, to the aid which they have thus afforded.

With regard to the insertion of new words, the Editor has felt much hesitation and embarrassment. Some thousands have been added in the course of this revision, and the number might have been swelled to many thousands more, without the slightest difficulty. There is, at the present day, especially in England, a boldness of innovation on this subject which amounts to absolute licentiousness. A hasty introduction into our dictionaries, of new terms, under such circumstances, is greatly to be deprecated. Our vocabulary is already encumbered with a multitude of words which have never formed a permanent part of English literature, and it is a serious evil to add to their number. Nothing, on the contrary, is so much needed as a thorough expurgation of our dictionaries in this respect — the rejection of many thousands of words, which may properly find a place in the glossaries of antiquarians, as a curious exhibition of what has been proposed, but never adopted, as a part of our language, but which, for that reason, can have no claim to stand in a dictionary designed for general use. All words, indeed, which are necessary to an understanding of our great writers, such as Bacon, Spenser, Shakespeare, &c., ought, though now obsolete, to be carefully retained; and in the present revision a considerable number of this class have been introduced for the first time. Other words have likewise been admitted, to a limited extent, namely, the familiar terms of common life in England, which have been much used of late by popular writers in Great Britain. Many of these need to be explained for the benefit of readers in this country; and, if marked as "familiar," "colloquial," or "low," according to their true character, they may be safely inserted in our dictionaries, and are entitled to a place there, as forming a constituent part of our written and spoken language. One of the most difficult questions on this subject relates to the introduction of technical and scientific terms. Most of our general dictionaries are, at present, without any plan as to the extent and proportion in which such words should be inserted, nor can they ever be reduced to order until each department is revised by men of science who are intimately acquainted with the subjects, and who are competent to decide what terms ought to be admitted into a general dictionary, and what terms should be reserved for special dictionaries devoted to distinct branches of science. Something of this kind, on a limited scale, has been attempted in the progress of this revision. Lists of words have been obtained from the gentlemen mentioned above, which might properly be inserted in this volume; and very few terms of this class have been admitted except under their direction. In accordance with their advice, a small number have been excluded, but in this respect the Editor has not felt at liberty to carry out his views in their full extent.

In respect to Americanisms, properly so called, it is known to those who are conversant with the subject, that they are less numerous than has been generally supposed. Most of those familiar words, especially of our older States, which have been considered as peculiar to our country, were brought by our ancestors from Great Britain, and are still in constant use there as local terms. The recent investigations of Forby, Holloway, and Halliwell have thrown much light on this subject, and the names of these authors are, therefore, frequently placed under the words in question, to indicate their origin and their present use in England. Notes have also been added to some words which are peculiar to our country, but their number is comparatively small.

In reference to Orthography, some important alterations have been made, but in strict conformity, it is believed, with the Author's principles on this subject. The changes in our orthography recommended by Dr. Webster are of two distinct kinds, and rest on very different grounds. These it may be proper for a moment to consider. His main principle was, that the tendencies of our language to greater simplicity and broader analogies ought to be watched and cherished with the utmost care. He felt, therefore, that whenever a movement toward wider analogies and more general rules had advanced so far as to leave but few exceptions to impede its progress, those exceptions ought to be set aside at once, and the analogy rendered complete. On this ground, he rejected the u from such words as favour, labour, &c. Of these we have a large number, which came to us, in most cases, from Latin terminations in or, through the Norman French, but encumbered with the silent u, as in emperour, authour, odour, &c. From this entire class, except about twenty words, the u has been gradually dropped, and in respect to these, scarcely any two persons can be found, however strenuous for retaining it, who are in practice consistent with each other, or with themselves, as to the words in which this letter is used. In fact, we have reached a point where, unless we take Webster and the dictionaries which agree with him as our guide, we have no standard on the subject; for Johnson, Walker, and others retain the u in numerous words into which no one would think of introducing it at the present day. Public convenience, therefore, demands that we do at once what must ultimately be done. No one can believe that the progress of our language will be arrested on this subject. The u will speedily be omitted in all words of this class, unless, from the sacredness of its associations, it be retained in Saviour, which may stand for a time as a solitary exception. Nor is it Dr. Webster who is the innovator in this case, but the English mind, which has for two centuries been throwing off a useless encumbrance, and moving steadily on toward greater simplicity in the structure of our language. Such, too, is the case with certain terminations in re, pronounced like er; as, centre, metre, &c. We have numerous words of this class, derived from the French, all of which originally ended in re; as, cedre (cedre), chambre (chambre), &c. These have been gradually conformed to the English spelling and pronunciation, till the number in re is reduced to not far from twenty words, with their derivatives, and in respect to them also the process is still going on. Center is, to a considerable extent, the spelling of the best mathematical writers. Meter is the word given by Walker in his Rhyming Dictionary, from a sense of the gross inconsistency of attaching to this word and its derivative, diameter, a different termination. Others are gradually undergoing the same change. Dr. Webster proposes, therefore, to complete the analogy at once, and conform the spelling of the few that remain to the general principles of our language. Mire, lucre, and massacre present the only difficulty, from their liability, if changed, to be mispronounced, and may therefore be suffered to stand as necessary exceptions. Another departure from the principles of English orthography which Dr. Webster has endeavored to correct, is one that was pointed out by Walker, in very emphatic terms, nearly fifty years ago. The principle in question is this,—that, in adding to a word the formatives ing, ed, er, &c., a single consonant (if one precedes) is doubled when the accent falls on the last syllable, as in forgetting, beginning, &c., but is not doubled when the accent falls on any of the preceding syllables, as in benefiting, gardening, &c. Walker, in his fifth Aphorism, says, "Dr. Lowth justly remarks that an error frequently takes place in the words worshipping, counselling, &c., which, having the accent on the first syllable ought to be written worshiping, counseling. An ignorance of this rule has led many to write big ted, for bigoted, and from this spelling has frequently arisen a false pronunciation. But no letter seems to be more frequently doubled improperly than l. Why we should write libelling, levelling, revelling, and yet offering, suffering, reasoning, I am totally at a loss to determine, and unless l can give a better plea than any other letter of the alphabet for being doubled in this situation, I must, in the style of Lucian, in his trial of the letter T, declare for an expulsion." These were the deliberate and latest opinions of Walker. If he had taken the trouble to carry them into his vocabulary, instead of relying on a mere remark of this kind for the correction of the error,—if he had simply stated, under about forty verbs, how the participle should be spelt (for he did not give participles in his Dictionary), and had altered six or eight words, as worshipper into worshiper, traveller into traveler, &c., the error would probably, by this time, have been wholly eradicated from our orthography, and Dr. Webster would have escaped much ignorant vituperation for following in the footsteps of Walker and of Lowth. Walker also says in his Aphorisms, "Why should we not write dullness, fullness, skillful, willful, as well as stiffness and gruffness?" The principles of our language plainly require us to do so; and Dr. Webster felt that the change might easily be made. The words which need to be reduced to this analogy are only about eight in number, including installment and inthrallment, which, if spelt with a single l, are liable to be mispronounced instălment, &c Again, the words expense, license, recompense, which formerly had a c in the last syllable, have now taken an s, because the latter consonant is the only one used in the derivatives; as, expensive, &c. A similar change is needed in only three words more to complete the analogy, namely, defense, offense, and pretense, and these Dr Webster has changed. It is sometimes asked, "Why not change fence also?" For the simple reason, that its derivatives are spelt with a c as fenced, fencing, and the word, therefore, stands regularly with others of its own class. Finally, Dr Webster proposes to drop the u in mould and moult, because it has been dropped from gold, and all other words of the same ending. Such are the principal changes, under this head, introduced by Dr Webster into his Dictionary In the present edition, the words are spelt in both ways, for the convenience of the public, except in cases where this seemed to be unnecessary, or was found to be inconvenient. These changes, considering the difficulty that always belongs to such a subject, have met with far more favor from the public than was reasonably to be expected. Most of them have been extensively adopted in our country. They are gaining ground daily, as the reasons by which they are supported are more generally understood; and it is confidently believed that, being founded in established analogies, and intended merely to repress irregularities and remove petty exceptions, they must ultimately prevail.

The other class of changes mentioned above rests on a different basis — that of Etymology. These will be estimated very differently, according to the acquaintance of different persons with the languages from which the words are derived. When Dr. Webster substituted bridegoom for bridegroom, fether for feather, &c., the German critics highly applauded the change They predicted its speedy and universal reception, because similar improvements, on a much broader scale, had been easily made in their language. But Dr. Webster found the case to be widely different among us. After an experiment of twelve years, he restored the old orthography to a considerable number of such words In the present edition, it is restored in respect to nearly all that remain, from the full conviction, that, however desirable these changes may be, in themselves considered, as they do not relate to the general analogies of the language, and can not be duly appreciated by the body of the people, they will never be generally received.

On the subject of Pronunciation, much labor has been bestowed in the progress of this revision. A careful comparison has been made with the latest authorities, and wherever changes seemed desirable, and could be made in consistency with the Author's principles, they have been here introduced. The Key to Pronunciation has been somewhat enlarged, and placed at the bottom of each page, for greater ease of reference, and the pointed letters have been used to a still greater extent Many thousand words have been re-spelled, and no efforts have been spared to render the work, in all respects, a complete Pronouncing Dictionary. In the progress of these labors, the Editor has been frequently struck with the wisdom of Dr. Webster, in not attempting too much as to marking the pronunciation Most of the later orthoepists, as Knowles, Smart, &c., have made their system of notation so extensive and complicated, and have aimed to exhibit so many nice shades of distinction, as in many cases to perplex, rather than aid.

The Publishers, being desirous to make this, in all respects, a complete work of reference, have introduced, at the close of the volume, a list of Greek and Latin Proper Names, with their pronunciation, prepared by Professor THACHER, of Yale College, a list of Scripture Proper Names, prepared by Professor PORTER, of Yale College; and a Pronouncing Vocabulary of Modern Geographical Names, prepared also under the superintendence of Professor PORTER. Of these a full account will be found in the several prefaces by which they are accompanied.

In conclusion, the Editor would acknowledge his obligations to the gentlemen who have aided him for more than two years in these labors — Mr. SAMUEL W BARNUM, M. A., of Yale College, and WILLIAM G. WEBSTER, Esq, of New Haven. The intimate acquaintance of the latter with his father's views has made his counsel and co-operation of great value in the progress of this revision

To the overseers of the mechanical execution of this work, at the BOSTON TYPE AND STEREOTYPE FOUNDRY, the Editor would likewise make his acknowledgments, for many valuable suggestions, during the progress of the revision, and for the watchful care and assiduity with which they have performed the difficult task of giving accuracy to the details of this volume.

NEW HAVEN, September, 1847.

NOTE — Among the sources from which words not in former editions have been derived, mention should be made of a catalogue of between five and six thousand, furnished by President ALLEN, late of Bowdoin College, which were collected by him in the course of his reading, during a period of forty years, from several hundred volumes of general literature, and given for the most part with authorities annexed This catalogue, added to a similar list formerly furnished to Dr Webster, makes an aggregate of some thousands of new words placed in the hands of the Author and Proprietors of this Dictionary, thus contributing materials for its improvement.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE TO THE EDITION OF 1828.

In the year 1783, just at the close of the Revolution, I published an elementary book for facilitating the acquisition of our vernacular tongue, and for correcting a vicious pronunciation which prevailed extensively among the common people of this country. Soon after the publication of that work, — I believe in the following year, — that learned and respectable scholar, the Rev. Dr. Goodrich, of Durham, one of the trustees of Yale College, suggested to me the propriety and expediency of my compiling a Dictionary which should complete a system for the instruction of the citizens of this country in the language. At that time, I could not indulge the thought, much less the hope, of undertaking such a work, as I was neither qualified by research, nor had I the means of support, during the execution of the work, had I been disposed to undertake it. For many years, therefore, though I considered such a work as very desirable, yet it appeared to me impracticable, as I was under the necessity of devoting my time to other occupations for obtaining subsistence.

About thirty-five years ago, I began to think of attempting the compilation of a Dictionary I was induced to this undertaking, not more by the suggestion of friends, than by my own experience of the want of such a work while reading modern books of science. In this pursuit I found almost insuperable difficulties, from the want of a dictionary for explaining many new words which recent discoveries in the physical sciences had introduced into use To remedy this defect in part, I published my Compendious Dictionary in 1806, and soon after made preparations for undertaking a larger work.

My original design did not extend to an investigation of the origin and progress of our language, much less of other languages I limited my views to the correcting of certain errors in the best English dictionaries, and to the supplying of words in which they are deficient. But after writing through two letters of the alphabet, I determined to change my plan. I found myself embarrassed, at every step, for want of a knowledge of the origin of words, which Johnson, Bailey, Junius, Skinner, and some other authors, do not afford the means of obtaining Then, laying aside my manuscripts, and all books treating of language, except lexicons and dictionaries, I endeavored, by a diligent comparison of words having the same or cognate radical letters, in about twenty languages, to obtain a more correct knowledge of the primary sense of original words, of the affinities between the English and many other languages, and thus to enable myself to trace words to their source.

I had not pursued this course more than three or four years before I discovered that I had to unlearn a great deal that I had spent years in learning, and that it was necessary for me to go back to the first rudiments of a branch of erudition which I had before cultivated, as I had supposed, with success

I spent ten years in this comparison of radical words, and in forming a Synopsis of the principal Words in twenty Languages, arranged in Classes under their primary Elements or Letters The result has been to open what are to me new views of language, and to unfold what appear to be the genuine principles on which these languages are constructed.

After completing this Synopsis, I proceeded to correct what I had written of the Dictionary, and to complete the remaining part of the work. But before I had finished it, I determined on a voyage to Europe, with the view of obtaining some books and some assistance which I wanted, of learning the real state of the pronunciation of our language in England, as well as the general state of philology in that country, and of attempting to bring about some agreement or coincidence of opinions in regard to unsettled points in pronunciation and grammatical construction In some of these objects, I failed; in others, my designs were answered

It is not only important, but in a degree necessary, that the people of this country should have an American Dictionary of the English Language; for, although the body of the language is the same as in England, and it is desirable to perpetuate that sameness, yet some differences must exist. Language is the expression of ideas, and if the people of one country can not preserve an identity of ideas, they can not retain an identity of language Now, an identity of ideas depends materially upon a sameness of things or objects with which the people of the two countries are conversant. But in no two portions of the earth, remote from each other, can such identity be found Even physical objects must be different. But the principal differences between the people of this country and of all others arise from different forms of government, different laws, institutions, and customs Thus the practice of hawking and hunting, the institution of heraldry, and the feudal system of England, originated terms which formed, and some of which now form, a necessary part of the language of that country; but, in the United States, many of these terms are no part of our present language, and they can not be, for the things which they express do not exist in this country. They can be known to us only as obsolete or as foreign words. On the other hand, the institutions in this country which are new and peculiar give rise to new terms, or to new applications of old terms, unknown to the people of England, which can not be explained by them, and which will not be inserted in their dictionaries, unless copied from ours. Thus the terms land-office, land-warrant, location of land, consociation of churches, regent of a university, intendant of a city, plantation, selectmen, senate, congress, court, assembly, escheat, &c, are either words not belonging to the language of England, or they are applied to things in this country which do not exist in that No person in this country will be satisfied with the English definitions of the words congress, senate, and assembly, court, &c.; for although these are words used in England, yet they are applied in this country to express ideas which they do not express in that country. With our present constitutions of government, escheat can never have its feudal sense in the United States

But this is not all. In many cases, the nature of our governments and of our civil institutions requires an appropriate language in the definition of words, even when the words express the same thing as in England. Thus the English dictionaries inform us that a justice is one deputed by the king to do right by way of judgment; he is a lord by his office; justices of the peace are appointed by the king's commission — language which is inaccurate in respect to this officer in the United States. So constitutionally is defined, by CHALMERS, legally; but in this country the distinction between constitution and law requires a different definition. In the United States, a plantation is a very different thing from what it is in England. The word marshal, in this country, has one important application unknown in England, or in Europe

A great number of words in our language require to be defined in a phraseology accommodated to the condition and institutions of the people in these States, and the people of England must look to an American Dictionary for a correct understanding of such terms

The necessity, therefore, of a dictionary suited to the people of the United States is obvious; and I should suppose that, this fact being admitted, there could be no difference of opinion as to the time when such a work ought to be substituted for English dictionaries.

There are many other considerations of a public nature which serve to justify this attempt to furnish an American work which shall be a guide to the youth of the United States Most of these are too obvious to require illustration.

One consideration, however, which is dictated by my own feelings, but which, I trust, will meet with approbation in correspondent feelings in my fellow-citizens, ought not to be passed in silence. It is this. "The chief glory of a nation," says DR JOHNSON, "arises from its authors" With this opinion deeply impressed on my mind, I have the same ambition which actuated that great man when he expressed a wish to give celebrity to BACON, to HOOKER, to MILTON, and to BOYLE

I do not, indeed, expect to add celebrity to the names of FRANKLIN, WASHINGTON, ADAMS, JAY, MADISON, MARSHALL, RAMSAY, DWIGHT, SMITH, TRUMBULL, HAMILTON, BELKNAP, AMES, MASON, KENT, HARE, SILLIMAN, CLEAVELAND, WALSH, IRVING, and many other Americans distinguished by their writings or by their science; but it is with pride and satisfaction that I can place them, as authorities, on the same page with those of BOYLE, HOOKER, MILTON, DRYDEN, ADDISON, RAY, MILNER, COWPER, DAVY, THOMSON, and JAMESON

A life devoted to reading and to an investigation of the origin and principles of our vernacular language, and especially a particular examination of the best English writers, with a view to a comparison of their style and phraseology with those of the best American writers, and with our colloquial usage, enables me to affirm, with confidence, that the genuine English idiom is as well preserved by the unmixed English of this country as it is by the best English writers . . . It is true that many of our writers have neglected to cultivate taste and the embellishments of style; but even these have written the language in its genuine idiom In this respect, FRANKLIN and WASHINGTON, whose language is their hereditary mother-tongue, unsophisticated by modern grammar, present as pure models of genuine English as ADDISON or SWIFT But I may go further, and affirm, with truth, that our country has produced some of the best models of composition The style of President SMITH, of the authors of the FEDERALIST, of MR. AMES; of DR MASON, of MR HAMILTON, of Chancellor KENT, [the prose] of MR. BARLOW, of DR CHANNING, of WASHINGTON IRVING, of the legal decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, of the reports of legal decisions in some of the particular States, and many other writings, — in purity, in elegance, and in technical precision, is equaled only by that of the best British authors, and surpassed by that of no English compositions of a similar kind.

The United States commenced their existence under circumstances wholly novel and unexampled in the history of nations They commenced with civilization, with learning, with science, with constitutions of free government, and with that best gift of God to man, the Christian religion Their population is now equal to that of England; in arts and sciences, our citizens are very little behind the most enlightened people on earth — in some respects they have no superiors, and our language, within two centuries, will be spoken by more people in this country than any other language on earth, except the Chinese, in Asia — and even that may not be an exception

It has been my aim in this work, now offered to my fellow-citizens, to ascertain the true principles of the language, in its orthography and structure, to purify it from some palpable errors, and reduce the number of its anomalies, thus giving it more regularity and consistency in its forms, both of words and sentences, and in this manner to furnish a standard of our vernacular tongue, which we shall not be ashamed to bequeath to five hundred millions of people, who are destined to occupy, and I hope to adorn, the vast territory within our jurisdiction

If the language can be improved in regularity, so as to be more easily acquired by our own citizens and by foreigners, and thus be rendered a more useful instrument for the propagation of science, arts, civilization, and Christianity, if it can be rescued from the mischievous influence of sciolists, and that dabbling spirit of innovation which is perpetually disturbing its settled usages and filling it with anomalies, if, in short, our vernacular language can be redeemed from corruptions, and our philology and literature from degradation, — it would be a source of great satisfaction to me to be one among the instruments of promoting these valuable objects If this object can not be effected, and my wishes and hopes are to be frustrated, my labor will be lost, and this work must sink into oblivion

This Dictionary, like all others of the kind, must be left, in some degree, imperfect; for what individual is competent to trace to their source, and define in all their various applications, popular, scientific, and technical, seventy or eighty thousand words! It satisfies my mind that I have done all that my health, my talents, and my pecuniary means would enable me to accomplish I present it to my fellow-citizens, not with frigid indifference, but with my ardent wishes for their improvement and their happiness, and for the continued increase of the wealth, the learning, the moral and religious elevation of character, and the glory, of my country.

To that great and benevolent Being, who, during the preparation of this work, has sustained a feeble constitution, amidst obstacles and toils, disappointments, infirmities, and depression, — who has borne me and my manuscripts in safety across the Atlantic, and given me strength and resolution to bring the work to a close, — I would present the tribute of my most grateful acknowledgments. And if the talent which he intrusted to my care has not been put to the most profitable use in his service, I hope it has not been "kept laid up in a napkin," and that any misapplication of it may be graciously forgiven.

NOAH WEBSTER.

MEMOIR OF NOAH WEBSTER.

BY CHAUNCEY A. GOODRICH, LL. D.

It is natural for those who make frequent use of a work like this, to desire some knowledge of the author's life, and especially of that long course of intellectual labor by which he contributed so largely to the literary treasures of our language. To gratify this desire is the object of the present Memoir. A brief outline will be given of the leading occurrences of his life, with particular reference to the occasions which called forth the principal productions of his pen. The materials of this sketch were obtained from Dr. Webster himself, about ten years before his death, and were first used in the preparation of a memoir inserted in the "National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans," in the year 1833. That memoir has been re-written, with large additions, and is now brought down to the period of the author's death.

Noah Webster was born in Hartford, Connecticut, about three miles from the center of the city, on the 16th of October, 1758. His father was a respectable farmer and justice of the peace, and was a descendant, in the fourth generation, of John Webster, one of the first settlers of Hartford, who was a magistrate, or member of the colonial council from its first formation, and, at a subsequent period, governor of Connecticut. His mother was a descendant of William Bradford, the second governor of the Plymouth colony. The family was remarkable for longevity. His father died at the advanced age of nearly ninety two. He had one of his brothers lived considerably beyond the age of eighty. His remaining brother died in his eightieth year, and of his two sisters, one was advanced beyond seventy, and the other had nearly reached the same age, at the period of their death.

Mr. Webster commenced the study of the classics, in the year 1772, under the instruction of the clergyman of the parish, the Rev. Nathan Perkins, D. D., and in 1774 was admitted a member of Yale College. The war of the revolution, commencing the next year, interrupted the regular attendance of the students on their usual exercises, and deprived them of no small part of the advantages of a collegiate course of instruction. In his Junior year, when the western part of New England was thrown into confusion by General Burgoyne's expedition from Canada, Mr. Webster volunteered his services under the command of his father, who was captain in the alarm list, a body comprising those of the militia who were above forty-five years of age, and who were called into the field only on pressing emergencies. In that campaign, all the males of the family, four in number, were in the army at the same time. Notwithstanding the interruption of his studies by these causes, Mr. Webster graduated with reputation in 1778.

The class to which he belonged produced an unusual number of men who were afterward distinguished in public life. Among these may be mentioned Joel Barlow, author of the Columbiad, and minister of the United States to the court of France, Oliver Wolcott, secretary of the treasury of the United States under the administration of Washington, and subsequently governor of the State of Connecticut, Uriah Tracy, a distinguished member of the Senate of the United States, Stephen Jacob, chief justice, and Noah Smith, associate judge, of the Supreme Court of Vermont, Zephaniah Swift, chief justice, and Ashur Miller, associate judge, of the Supreme Court of Connecticut, besides a number of others, who were either members of Congress or among the leaders of our great political parties at the commencement of the present century.

The period at which Mr. Webster entered upon life was an unpropitious one for a young man to be cast upon the world without property. The country was impoverished by the war to a degree of which it is difficult, at the present day, to form any just conception; there was no prospect of peace, the issue of the contest was felt, by the most sanguine, to be extremely doubtful, and the practice of the law, which Mr. Webster intended to pursue, was in a great measure set aside by the general calamity. It was under these circumstances that, on his return from the Commencement when he graduated, his father gave him an eight dollar bill of the Continental currency (then worth about four dollars in silver), and told him that he must thenceforth rely on his own exertions for support. As a means of immediate subsistence, he resorted to the instruction of a school; and, during the summer of 1779, resided at Hartford, Connecticut, in the family of Mr., afterwards Chief Justice, Ellsworth. An intimate friendship was thus formed between these two gentlemen, which was interrupted only by the death of the chief justice.

Not having the means of obtaining a regular education for the bar, Mr. Webster, at the suggestion of a distinguished counselor of his acquaintance, determined to pursue the study of the law in the intervals of his regular employment, without the aid of an instructor, and, having presented himself for examination, at the expiration of two years, was admitted to practice in the year 1781. As he had no encouragement to open an office, in the existing state of the country, he resumed the business of instruction, and taught a classical school, in 1782, at Goshen, in Orange county, New York. Here, in a desponding state of mind, created by the unsettled condition of things at the close of the war, and the gloomy prospects for business, he undertook an employment which gave a complexion to his whole future life. This was the compilation of books for the instruction of youth in schools. Having prepared the first draught of an elementary treatise of this kind, he made a journey to Philadelphia in the autumn of the same year, and, after exhibiting a specimen of the work to several members of Congress, among whom was Mr. Madison, and to the Rev. S. S. Smith, D. D., at that time a professor, and afterward president, of the college at Princeton, he was encouraged by their approbation to prosecute his design. Accordingly, in the winter following, he revised what he had written, and, leaving Goshen in 1783, he returned to Hartford, where he published his "First Part of a Grammatical Institute of the English Language." The second and third parts were published in the years immediately following. These works, comprising a Spelling Book, an English Grammar, and a compilation for reading, were the first books of the kind published in the United States. They were gradually introduced into most of the schools of our country, and to so great an extent has the Spelling Book been used, that, during the twenty years in which he was employed in compiling his American Dictionary, the entire support of his family was derived from the profit of this work, at a premium for copyright of less than a cent a copy. About twenty-four millions of this book have been published, down to the present year, 1847, in the different forms which it assumed under the revision of the author, and its popularity has gone on continually increasing. The demand for some years past has averaged about one million copies a year. To its influence, probably, more than to any other cause, are we indebted for that remarkable uniformity of pronunciation in our country, which is so often spoken of with surprise by English travelers.

In entering thus early on his literary career, Mr. Webster did not confine himself to the publication of his own works. At a period when nothing had as yet been done to perpetuate the memorials of our early history, he led the way, in this important branch of literary effort, by the publication of that highly valuable and characteristic work, Governor Winthrop's Journal. Having learnt that a manuscript copy was in possession of Governor Trumbull, of Connecticut, he caused it to be transcribed at his own expense, by the governor's private secretary, and risked more than the amount of his whole property in its publication. The sale never remunerated him for the expenses thus incurred.

At the period of Mr. Webster's return to Hartford, in 1783, the state was agitated by violent dissensions on the subject of a grant, made by Congress to the army, of half pay for life, which was afterward commuted for a grant of full pay for five years beyond their term of service. To this grant it was strongly objected, that, if the army had suffered by the reduced value of the bills in which they were paid, the country at large had sustained an equal loss by the depreciation of the currency, and by other causes So strong was the excitement on this subject, that public meetings were held throughout the state, to prevent the laws of Congress from being carried into effect, and at length a convention met at Middletown with the same design, at which two thirds of the towns in Connecticut were represented In this state of things, Mr Webster, though only twenty-five years of age, came forward to vindicate the measures of Congress, and wrote a series of papers on the subject, under the signature of HONORIUS, which were published in the Connecticut Courant, and read extensively throughout the state The effect was great At the next election, in April, 1784, a large majority of the legislature were supporters of Congress in their measures So highly were Mr Webster's services appreciated on this occasion, that he received the thanks of Governor Trumbull in person, and was publicly declared by a member of the council, to have "done more to allay popular discontent, and support the authority of Congress at this crisis, than any other man"

These occurrences in his native state, together with the distress and stagnation of business in the whole country, resulting from the want of power in Congress to carry its measures into effect, and to secure to the people the benefits of a stable government, convinced Mr Webster that the old Confederation, after the dangers of the war were past, was utterly inadequate to the necessities of the people He therefore published a pamphlet, in the winter of 1784–5, entitled "Sketches of American Policy," in which, after treating of the general principles of government, he endeavored to prove that it was absolutely necessary, for the welfare and safety of the United States, to establish a new system of government, which should act not on the states, but directly on individuals, and vest in Congress full power to carry its laws into effect Being on a journey to the Southern States, in May, 1785, he went to Mount Vernon, and presented a copy of this pamphlet to General Washington It contained, the writer believes, the first distinct proposal, made through the medium of the press, for a new constitution of the United States

One object of Mr Webster's journey to the south was, to petition the state legislatures for the enactment of a law securing to authors an exclusive right to the publication of their writings In this he succeeded to a considerable extent, and the public attention was thus called to a provision for the support of American literature, which was rendered more effectual by a general copyright law, enacted by Congress soon after the formation of our government At a much later period (in the years 1830–31), Mr Webster passed a winter at Washington, with the single view of endeavoring to procure an alteration of the existing law, which should extend the term of copyright, and thus give a more ample reward to the labors of our artists and literary men In this design he succeeded, and an act was passed more liberal in its provisions than the former law, though less so than the laws of some European governments on this subject

On his return from the south, Mr Webster spent the summer of 1785 at Baltimore, and employed his time in preparing a course of lectures on the English language, which were delivered, during the year 1786, in the principal Atlantic cities, and were published in 1789, in an octavo volume, with the title of "Dissertations on the English Language"

The year 1787 was spent by Mr Webster at Philadelphia, as superintendent of an Episcopal academy The convention which framed the present constitution of the United States were in session at Philadelphia during a part of this year, and when their labors were closed, Mr Webster was solicited by Mr Fitzsimmons, one of the members, to give the aid of his pen in recommending the new system of government to the people He accordingly wrote a pamphlet on this subject, entitled an "Examination of the Leading Principles of the Federal Constitution"

In 1788, Mr Webster attempted to establish a periodical in New York, and for one year published the "American Magazine," which, however, failed of success, as did also an attempt to combine the efforts of other gentlemen in a similar undertaking The country was not yet prepared for such a work.

In 1789, when the prospects of business became more encouraging, after the adoption of the new constitution, Mr Webster settled himself at Hartford in the practice of the law Here he formed or renewed an acquaintance with a number of young men just entering upon life, who were ardently devoted, like himself, to literary pursuits Among these may be mentioned his two classmates, Barlow and Wolcott, Trumbull, author of McFingal, Richard Alsop, Dr Lemuel Hopkins, and, though somewhat older, the Rev. Nathan Strong, pastor of the First Congregational Church, who, in common with the three last mentioned, was highly distinguished for the penetration of his intellect and the keenness of his wit The incessant contact of such minds at the forming period of their progress, had great influence on the literary habits of them all in after life It gave them a solid and manly cast of thought, a simplicity of taste, a directness of statement, a freedom from all affectation and exuberance of imagery or diction, which are often best acquired by the salutary use of ridicule, in the action and re-action on each other of keen and penetrating minds. It had, likewise, a powerful influence on the social circles in which they moved, and the biographer of Governor Wolcott has justly remarked, that at this time "few cities in the Union could boast of a more cultivated or intelligent society than Hartford, whether men or women."

In the autumn of the same year, encouraged by the prospect of increasing business, Mr Webster married the daughter of William Greenleaf, Esq, of Boston, a lady of a highly cultivated intellect, and of great elegance and grace of manners. His friend Trumbull speaks of this event in one of his letters to Wolcott, who was then at New York, in his characteristic vein of humor "Webster has returned, and brought with him a very pretty wife I wish him success, but I doubt, in the present decay of business in our profession, whether his profits will enable him to keep up the style he sets out with I fear he will breakfast upon Institutes, dine upon Dissertations, and go to bed supperless" The result, however, was more favorable than it appeared in the sportive anticipations of Trumbull. Mr. Webster found his business profitable, and continually increasing, during his residence of some years in the practice of the law at Hartford

This employment he was induced to relinquish, in 1793, by an interesting crisis in public affairs General Washington's celebrated proclamation of neutrality, rendered necessary by the efforts of the French minister, Genet, to raise troops in our country for the invasion of Louisiana, and to fit out privateers against nations at peace with the United States, had called forth the most bitter reproaches of the partisans of France, and it was even doubtful, for a time, whether the unbounded popularity of the FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY could repress the public effervescence in favor of embarking in the wars of the French revolution In this state of things, Mr. Webster was strongly solicited to give the support of his pen to the measures of the administration, by establishing a daily paper in the city of New York Though conscious of the sacrifice of personal ease which he was called upon to make, he was so strongly impressed with the dangers of the crisis, and so entirely devoted to the principles of Washington, that he did not hesitate to accede to the proposal Removing his family to New York, in November, 1793, he commenced a daily paper, under the title of the Minerva, and afterward a semi-weekly paper, with that of the Herald—names which were subsequently changed to those of the Commercial Advertiser, and New York Spectator This was the first example of a paper for the country, composed of the columns of a daily paper, without recomposition —a practice which has now become very common In addition to his labors as sole editor of these papers, Mr Webster published, in the year 1794, a pamphlet which had a very extensive circulation, entitled "The Revolution in France"

The publication of the treaty negotiated with Great Britain by Mr Jay, in 1795, aroused an opposition to its ratification of so violent a nature as to stagger for a time the firmness of Washington, and to threaten civil commotions Mr Webster, in common with General Hamilton and some of the ablest men of the country, came out in vindication of the treaty Under the signature of CURTIUS, he published a series of papers, which were very extensively reprinted throughout the country, and afterward collected by a bookseller of Philadelphia in a pamphlet form Of these, ten were contributed by himself, and two by Mr, afterward Chancellor, Kent As an evidence of their effect, it may not be improper to state, that Mr Rufus King expressed his opinion to Mr Jay, that the essays of CURTIUS had contributed more than any other papers of the same kind to allay the discontent and opposition to the treaty, assigning as a reason, that they were peculiarly well adapted to the understanding of the people at large

When Mr Webster resided in New York, the yellow fever prevailed at different times in most of our large Atlantic cities, and a controversy arose, among the physicians of Philadelphia and New York, on the question whether it was introduced by infection, or generated on the spot The subject interested Mr Webster deeply, and led him into a laborious investigation of the history of pestilential diseases at every period of the world The facts which he collected, with the inferences to which he was led, were embodied in a work of two volumes, octavo, which, in 1799, was published both in this country and in England This work has always been considered as a valuable repository of facts, and during the prevalence of the Asiatic cholera in the year 1832, the theories of the author seemed to receive so much confirmation, as to excite a more than ordinary interest in the work, both in Europe and America

During the wars which were excited by the French revolution, the power assumed by the belligerents to blockade their enemies' ports by proclamation, and the multiplied seizures of American vessels bound to such ports, produced various discussions respecting the rights of neutral nations in time of war. These discussions induced Mr. Webster to examine the subject historically; and, in 1802, he published a treatise full of minute information and able reasoning on the subject. A gentleman of competent abilities, who said he had read all that he could find on that subject in the English, French, German, and Italian languages, declared that he considered this treatise as the best he had seen. The same year, he also published "Historical Notices of the Origin and State of Banking Institutions and Insurance Offices," which was republished in Philadelphia by one Humphrey, without giving credit to the author, and a part of which, taken from this reprint, was incorporated into the Philadelphia edition of Rees's Cyclopedia.

At this time, Mr Webster resided at New Haven, to which place he had removed in the spring of 1798 For a short period after his departure from New York, he wrote for the papers mentioned above, which, although placed under the care of another editor, continued for a time to be his property. He very soon succeeded, however, in disposing of his interest in them, and from that time devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits

In the year 1807, Mr Webster published "A Philosophical and Practical Grammar of the English Language." This was a highly original work, the result of many years of diligent investigation. The author's views may be gathered from the motto on the title page, taken from Lord Bacon's Aphorisms — "Antisthenes, being asked what learning was most necessary, replied, 'To unlearn that which is naught'" He considered our English Grammars as objectionable in one important respect, namely, that of being too much conformed to those of the Latin and Greek languages in their nomenclature and classification True philosophy, he maintained, requires us to arrange things, and give them names, according to their real nature But our language is rude and irregular, in comparison with those of the ancients. It can not be reduced to the same orderly system The several parts of it can not be brought under the same names and classifications We need, therefore, a nomenclature of our own in some important particulars Thus the word pronoun properly denotes a substitute for a noun But, in many cases, words of this class are substitutes for clauses, or parts of sentences, and not for single nouns There are also other words, not ordinarily ranged among pronouns, which act equally as substitutes, that is, perform the office of pronouns Mr Webster, therefore, proposed to lay aside the word pronoun, and apply the term substitute to this whole class, as describing their true office Other changes were proposed, of the same nature, and for the same reasons No one, who examines the subject with attention, can doubt the advantages of Mr Webster's nomenclature, in itself considered It enabled him to give an analysis of sentences, and to explain constructions, in a manner incomparably superior to that of the ordinary systems His intimate acquaintance with the sources of our language prepared him to account, in the most satisfactory manner, for many puzzling forms of expression Still, the prejudice against a change of nomenclature is so great, that this work has been far less known than it ought to be It contains much valuable matter found in no other work, and is believed to be the most truly philosophical Grammar which we have of the English language

After publishing his Grammar, Mr Webster entered, in the same year (1807), on the great work of his life, which he had contemplated for a long period — that of preparing a new and complete Dictionary of the English language As preliminary to this, he had published, in 1806, a dictionary in the octavo form, containing a large number of words not to be found in any similar work, with the definitions corrected throughout, though necessarily expressed in very brief terms. From this time, his reading was turned more or less directly to this object A number of years were spent in collecting words which had not been introduced into the English dictionaries, in discriminating with exactness the various senses of all the words in our language, and adding those significations which they had recently received. Some estimate may be formed of the labor bestowed on this part of the work, from the fact that "The American Dictionary of the English Language" contained, in the first edition, twelve thousand words, and between thirty and forty thousand definitions, which are not to be found in any preceding work The number has been swelled, by subsequent additions, to about thirty thousand new words Seventy years had elapsed since the first publication of Johnson's Dictionary, and scarcely a single improvement had been attempted in the various editions through which it had passed, or the numerous compilations to which it had given rise, except by the addition of a few words to the vocabulary Yet in this period the English mind was putting itself forth in every direction, with an accuracy of research and a fertility of invention which are without a parallel in any other stage of its history A complete revolution had taken place in almost every branch of physical science; new departments had been created, new principles developed, new modes of classification and description adopted. The political changes which so signally marked that period, the excitement of feeling and conflict of opinion resulting from the American and French revolutions, and the numerous modifications which followed in the institutions of society, had also left a deep impress on the language of politics, law, and general literature. Under these circumstances, to make a defining dictionary adapted to the present state of our language, was to produce an entirely new work, and how well Mr. Webster executed the task, will appear from the decision of men best qualified to judge, both in this country and in Europe, who have declared that his improvements upon Johnson are even greater than Johnson himself made on those who preceded him. Still more labor, however, was bestowed on another part of the work, viz, the etymology of our leading terms. In this subject, Mr Webster had always felt a lively interest, as presenting one of the most curious exhibitions of the progress of the human mind But it was not till he had advanced considerably in the work as originally commenced, that he found how indispensable a knowledge of the true derivation of words is to an exact development of their various meanings At this point, therefore, he suspended his labors on the defining part of the Dictionary, and devoted a number of years to an inquiry into the origin of our language, and its connection with those of other countries In the course of these researches, he examined the vocabularies of twenty of the principal languages of the world, and made a synopsis of the most important words in each, arranging them under the same radical letters, with a translation of their significations, and references from one to another, when the senses are the same or similar He was thus enabled to discover the real or probable affinities between the different languages, and, in many instances, to discover the primary, physical idea of an original word, from which the secondary senses have branched forth Being thus furnished with a clew to guide him among the numerous, and often apparently inconsistent, significations of our most important words, he resumed his labors on the defining part of the Dictionary, and was able to give order and consistency to much that had before appeared confused and contradictory The results of his inquiries into the origin and filiation of languages were embodied in a work, about half the size of the American Dictionary, entitled "A Synopsis of Words in Twenty Languages." This, owing to the expense of the undertaking, has not yet been published, though its principal results, so far as our language is concerned, are briefly given in tracing the etymology of our leading terms

During the progress of these labors, Mr Webster, finding his resources inadequate to the support of his family at New Haven, removed, in 1812, to Amherst, a pleasant country town within eight miles of Northampton, Massachusetts Here he entered, with his characteristic ardor, into the literary and social interests of the people among whom he was placed His extensive library, which was open to all, and his elevated tone of thought and conversation, had naturally a powerful influence on the habits and feelings of a small and secluded population It was owing, in part, probably, to his removal to this town, that an academy was there established, which is now among the most flourishing seminaries of our land A question having soon after arisen respecting the removal of Williams College from a remote part of the state to some more central position, Mr Webster entered warmly into the design of procuring its establishment at Amherst, as one of the most beautiful and appropriate locations in New England Though the removal did not take place, so strong an interest on the subject was awakened in Amherst and the neighboring towns, that a new college was soon after founded there, in the establishment of which Mr Webster, as president of its first board of trustees, had great influence, both by his direct exertions to secure it patronage, and by the impulse which he had given to the cause of education in that part of the state

In 1822, Mr Webster returned with his family to New Haven, and, in 1823, received the degree of LL D from Yale College Having nearly completed his Dictionary, he resolved on a voyage to Europe, with a view to perfect the work by consulting literary men abroad, and by examining some standard authors, to which he could not gain access in this country. He accordingly sailed for France in June, 1824, and spent two months at Paris in consulting several rare works in the Bibliotheque du Roi, and then went to England, where he remained till May, 1825 He spent about eight months at the University of Cambridge, where he had free access to the public libraries, and there he finished "THE AMERICAN DICTIONARY" He afterward visited London, Oxford, and some of the other principal cities of England, and in June returned to this country This visit to England gave him an opportunity to become acquainted with literary men and literary institutions in that country, and to learn the real state of the English language there

Soon after Dr Webster returned to this country, the necessary arrangements were made for the publication of the work An edition of twenty-five hundred copies was printed in this country, at the close of 1828, which was followed by an edition of three thousand in England, under the superintendence of E H. Barker, Esq , editor of the Thesaurus Græcæ Linguæ of Henry Stephens With the publication of the American Dictionary, at the age of seventy, Dr Webster considered the labors of his literary life as brought, in a great measure, to a close He revised a few of his earlier works for publication, and particularly his "History of the United States," a book designed for the higher classes of schools, for youth who are acquiring a taste for history, and for men of business who have not time to peruse larger treatises

In 1840–1, Dr Webster published a second edition of the American Dictionary, consisting of three thousand copies, in two volumes, royal octavo The improvements consisted chiefly in the addition of a number of thousand words to the vocabulary, the correction of definitions in several of the sciences, in conformity with later discoveries and classifications, and the introduction and explanation of many phrases from foreign languages, and of foreign terms used in books of music

In 1843, he published "A Collection of Papers on Political, Literary, and Moral Subjects," in one volume, octavo This was composed chiefly of tracts and disquisitions, which had been published at an earlier period of his life, either in the form of pamphlets, or of papers read before literary and philosophical societies, and printed among their Transactions It contains his "Observations on the French Revolution," his "Essay on the Rights of Neutral Nations," and the papers signed CURTIUS, in vindication of Mr Jay's treaty with Great Britain To these is added an elaborate dissertation "On the supposed Change in the Temperature of Winter," which was read before the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, in the year 1799 In this he controverts the opinion which has generally prevailed, that the temperature of the winter season, in northern latitudes, has suffered a material change, and become warmer in modern than it was in ancient times The subject was one which required very great minuteness and extent of historical research, and this paper contains the result of a series of investigations, which had been carried on, in conjunction with the author's other pursuits, for a period of more than ten years Many of the facts which it presents are of a very curious and striking nature There is, probably, no other treatise which exhibits the historical evidence on this subject with so much fullness and accuracy In addition to this, the volume contains a number of other papers of an interesting character, and the whole collection forms a truly valuable record of the author's earlier labors

In thus tracing the principal events of Dr Webster's life, we have reached the commencement of the year in which he died, and it may here be proper to pause for a moment, and consider some of those qualities and habits of mind which prepared him for this long course of public service and literary labor The leading traits in the character of Dr Webster were enterprise, self-reliance, and indomitable perseverance He was naturally of a sanguine temperament, and the circumstances under which he entered on the active duties of life were eminently suited to strengthen the original tendencies of his nature Our country was just struggling into national existence The public mind was full of ardor, energy, and expectation His early associates were men of powerful intellect, who were engaged, to a great extent, in laying the foundations of our government, and who have stamped the impress of their genius on the institutions of their country As the advocate of the Federal Constitution, and a strenuous supporter of Washington's administration, he was brought into habits of the closest intimacy with Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, Oliver Wolcott, Timothy Pickering, and the other great men on whom Washington relied for counsel and aid in organizing the new government The journal which he established at New York was their organ of communication with the public, in the great commercial emporium of the United States He was thus placed on terms of constant and confidential intercourse with the leading members of the cabinet, and the prominent supporters of Washington throughout the country While he had their respect as a ready and energetic writer, he enjoyed their counsel, imparted with the utmost freedom, as to the manner in which he might best conduct the defense of their common principles The natural result, especially on a mind constituted like his, was the formation of all his habits of thought and action into a resemblance to theirs Energy, self-reliance, fearlessness, the resolute defense of whatever he thought right and useful, the strong hope of ultimate success,—these became the great elements of his intellectual character He carried them with him, at a subsequent period, into all his literary pursuits, and they sustained him under the pressure of difficulties which would have crushed the spirit of almost any other man

One of the habits which Dr Webster formed in this early course of training, was that of arranging all his acquired knowledge in the most exact order, and keeping the elements of progressive thought continually within his reach Although his memory was uncommonly quick and tenacious, he saw, as the editor of a daily journal, how idle and unsafe it is to rely on mere recollection for the immense mass of materials which a public writer must have ever at command. He learnt, therefore, to preserve documents of all kinds with the utmost care. All that he had ever written, all that had been written against him, every thing that he met with in newspapers or periodicals which seemed likely to be of use at any future period, was carefully laid aside in its appropriate place, and was ready at a moment's warning He had also a particular mark by which he denoted, in every work he read, all the new words, or new senses of words, which came under his observation He filled the margin of his books with notes and comments containing corrections of errors, a comparison of dates, or references to corresponding passages in other works, until his whole library became a kind of Index Rerum, to which he could refer at once for every thing he had read

Another habit, which resulted in part from his early pursuits, was that of carrying on numerous and diversified employments at the same time To men of the present generation, Dr Webster is known chiefly as a learned philologist, and the natural inference would be, that he spent his whole life among his books, and chiefly in devotion to a single class of studies The fact, however, was far otherwise Though he was always a close student,—reading, thinking, and writing at every period of his life,—he never withdrew himself from the active employments of society After his first removal to New Haven, he was for a number of years one of the aldermen of the city, and judge of one of the state courts He also frequently represented that town in the legislature of the state During his residence at Amherst, he was called, in repeated instances, to discharge similar duties, and spent a part of several winters at Boston as a member of the General Court He entered with zeal into all the interests of the town and county where he lived, its schools and academies, its agriculture and mechanic arts, its advance in taste and refinement He gave freely of his time, his counsel, and the efforts of his pen, when requested, in public addresses, or through the medium of the press, for the promotion of every kind of social improvement Equally large and diversified was the range of his intellectual pursuits There was hardly any department of literature which he had not explored with lively interest, at some period of his life He wrote on a greater variety of topics than perhaps any other author of the United States,—on the foundations of government, the laws of nations, the rights of neutrals, the science of banking, the history of his country, the progress of diseases, and the variations of climate, on agriculture, commerce, education, morals, religion, and the great means of national advancement, in addition to the principal theme of his life, philology and grammar Such was the activity of his mind, and the delight he found in new acquisitions, that a change of employment was all the relief he needed from the weariness of protracted study The refreshment which others seek in journeys, or the entire suspension of intellectual effort, he found, during most of his life, in the stimulus afforded by some new and exciting object of pursuit Mental exertion was the native element of his soul, and it is not too much to say, that another instance of such long-continued literary toil, such steady, unfaltering industry, can hardly be found in the annals of our country

The last of those mental habits which will now be traced was that of original investigation, of thorough and penetrating research The period at which Dr Webster came forward in public life was one, to an uncommon extent, in which every important subject was discussed in its principles It was a period when the foundations of our civil polity were laid, and when such men as Hamilton, Madison, and Jay, became "the expounders of the constitution," and the advocates of the new government All things conspired to make the discussions of that day masterly exhibitions of reasoning and profound investigation,—the character of the men engaged, the conflict of great principles, and the weighty interests suspended on the issue Dr Webster for some years took a large share in these discussions, both in pamphlets and through the journal which he conducted The habits which he thus formed went with him into all the literary pursuits of his subsequent life They made him a bold, original thinker,—thorough in all his investigations, and fearless in proclaiming the results He had no deference for authority, except as sustained by argument He was no copyist, no mere compiler Every thing he wrote, from a chapter in "The Prompter," to his "Introduction to the American Dictionary," bore the same impress of original thought, personal observation, and independent inquiry

It is unnecessary to say how perfectly these habits were adapted to prepare Dr Webster for the leading employment of his life, the production of the American Dictionary Nothing but his eager pursuit of every kind of knowledge, and his exact system in bringing all that he had ever read completely under his command, could have enabled him to give in his first edition more than twelve thousand words and forty thousand definitions, which could then be found in no other similar work. Nothing but his passion for original investigation prevented him from building, like Todd, on the foundation of Johnson, or arranging Horne Tooke's etymologies, like Richardson, with some additions and improvements, under their proper heads in a dictionary. But, commencing with the Diversions of Purley as the starting-point of his researches, he was led by the character of his mind to widen continually the field of his inquiries. He passed from the western languages to the eastern, in tracing the affinities of his native tongue. He established some of those great principles which have made etymology a science, and led the way in that brilliant career of investigation by which the German philologists are throwing so clear a light on the origin and filiation of the principal languages of the globe. But into these studies he would never have entered, nor even thought of attempting such a work as an original dictionary of the English language, except under the impulse of those other traits, — that sanguine temperament, that spirit of self-reliance, that fearless determination to carry out every thing that he thought useful and true, to its utmost limits, — which were spoken of above, as forming the master principle of his character. It is difficult to conceive, at the present day, how rash and hopeless such an undertaking then appeared on the part of any citizen of the United States. It was much as though we should now hear of a similar design by one of the settlers of New Holland. He was assailed with a storm of ridicule at home and abroad, and even his best friends, while they admired his constancy, and were fully convinced of his erudition, had strong fears that he was engaged in a fruitless effort, — that he would never have justice done him, in bringing his work before the world under such adverse circumstances. Nothing, plainly, but uncommon ardor, boldness, and self-confidence, could have sustained him under the pressure of these difficulties. But such qualities, it must be confessed, notwithstanding all the support they afford, are not without their disadvantages. They often lead to the adoption of hasty opinions, especially in new and intricate inquiries. Of this Dr Webster was aware. He saw reason to change his views on many points, as he widened the sphere of his knowledge. In such cases, he retracted his former statements with the utmost frankness, for he had not a particle of that pride of opinion which makes men so often ashamed to confess an error, even when they have seen and abandoned it. This ardor of mind is apt, also, to lead men into a strength and confidence of statement which may wear at times the aspect of dogmatism. If Dr Webster should be thought by any one to have erred in this respect, the error, it should be remembered, was one of temperament — the almost necessary result of that bold, self-relying spirit, without which no man could have undertaken, much less have carried through, the Herculean task of preparing the American Dictionary. Those, however, who knew him best, can testify that his strength of statement, however great it might be, was never the result of arrogance or presumption. He spoke from the mere frankness of his nature, he practiced no reserve, he used none of that cautious phraseology with which most men conceal their feelings, or guard against misconstruction. He was an ardent lover of truth, and he spoke of the discoveries which he believed himself to have made, much as he would have spoken of the same discoveries when made by others. He was aware that there must be many things in a book like this, especially on a science so imperfect in its development as etymology, which would not stand the test of time. But he never doubted, even in the darkest seasons of discouragement and obloquy, that he could at last produce such a work, that the world "should not willingly let it die." The decision of the public verified his anticipations, and freed him from the charge of presumption. Three very large editions, at a high price, have already been exhausted in this country and England. The demand is still increasing on both sides of the Atlantic, and the author might well be gratified to learn, that a gentleman who asked, some years since, at one of the principal bookselling establishments of London, for the best English dictionary on their shelves, had this work handed to him with the remark, "That, sir, is the only real dictionary which we have of our language, though it was prepared by an American."

In his social habits, Dr Webster was distinguished by dignified ease, affability, and politeness. He was punctilious in his observance of all the mere proprieties of life. There was nothing that annoyed him more, or on which he remarked with greater keenness, than any violation of the established rules of decorum, any disposition to meddle with the concerns of others, or to encroach on the sanctity of those rights and feelings, which, as they cannot be protected by law, must owe their security to delicacy of sentiment in an enlightened community. He had an uncommon degree of refinement in all his thoughts and feelings. Never, in his most sportive or unguarded moments, did any sentiment escape him which was coarse or vulgar. He had, in this respect, almost a feminine purity of mind. It might be truly said of him, as was remarked concerning one of his distinguished cotemporaries in public life, that he was never known to utter an expression which might not have been used with entire freedom in the most refined female society. In his pecuniary transactions, he was acknowledged by all to be not only just, but liberal. It was a principle with him, for life, never to be in debt. Every thing was paid for at the time of purchase. In all his dealings and social intercourse, he was remarkably direct, frank, and open. He had but one character, and that was "known and read of all men." Whatever faults might be imputed to him, no one ever suspected him of double-dealing, no one ever thought he was capable of a mean or dishonorable action.

In the discharge of his domestic duties, Dr Webster was watchful, consistent, and firm. Though immersed in study, he kept in his hands the entire control of his family arrangements, down to the minutest particulars. Every thing was reduced to exact system, all moved on with perfect regularity and order, for method was the presiding principle of his life. In the government of his children there was but one rule, and that was instantaneous and entire obedience. This was insisted upon as right, — as, in the nature of things, due by a child to a parent. He did not rest his claim on any explanations, or on showing that the thing required was reasonable or beneficial. While he endeavored to make it clear to his children that he sought their happiness in whatever he required, he commanded as one having authority, and he enforced his commands to the utmost, as a duty which he owed equally to his children and to God, who had placed them under his control. He felt that on this subject there had been a gradual letting down of the tone of public sentiment, which was much to be deplored. Many, in breaking away from the sternness of Puritan discipline, have gone to the opposite extreme. They have virtually abandoned the exercise of parental authority, and endeavored to regulate the conduct of their children by reasoning and persuasion, — by the mere presentation of motives, and not by the enforcement of commands. If such persons succeed, as they rarely do, in preserving any thing like a comfortable state of subordination in their families, they fail at least in the accomplishment of one great end for which their offspring were committed to their care. They send forth their children into life without any of those habits of submission to lawful authority which are essential to the character of a good citizen and a useful member of society. In the intellectual training of his children, on the other hand, Dr Webster had much less of system and complicated machinery than many are disposed to adopt. His great principle was not to overdo, — to let nature have free scope, and to leave the development of the mind, within certain limits, to the operation of awakened curiosity directed to its proper objects. He therefore threw open his extensive library to his children at an early period of their lives, and said, in the words of Cotton Mather, 'Read, and you will know.' He felt that children should learn to acquire knowledge by severe effort, that the prevailing disposition to make every thing easy is unphilosophical and wrong, that the great object of early training is to form the mind into a capacity of surmounting intellectual difficulties of any and every kind. In his view, also, the young have much to learn in early life, the use of which they can not then comprehend. They must learn it by rote, particularly the spelling of so complicated a language as ours, and all those systems which lead forward children no faster than they can understand and apply every word they spell, he considered as ridiculously erroneous. He wished, on the contrary, at this early period of ready memory and limited comprehension, to store the mind with many things which would afterward be found of indispensible use, things which are learnt with the utmost reluctance, or rather in most cases, are not learnt at all, in the more advanced stages of intellectual progress. He felt that there must necessarily be much of drudgery in the formation of a thoroughly educated mind. He thought it wise, therefore, to commence these tasks which it involves, from the earliest period at which the youthful intellect can ordain them. Upon these principles he constructed his Spelling Book, and other works for the use of children. He designed to make them instructive, and not mere books of amusement. Whether his views were incorrect or philosophical, the public will judge.

In respect to religion, Dr Webster was a firm believer during a large part of his life in the great distinctive doctrines of our Puritan ancestors, whose character he always regarded with the highest veneration. There was a period, however, from the time of his leaving college to the age of forty, when he had doubts as to some of those doctrines, and rested in a different system. Soon after he graduated, being uncertain what business to attempt, or by what means he could obtain subsistence, he felt his mind greatly perplexed, and almost overwhelmed with gloomy apprehensions. In this state, as he afterward informed a friend, he read Johnson's Rambler with unusual interest, and, in closing the last volume, he made a firm resolution to pursue a course of virtue through life, and to perform every moral and social duty with scrupulous exactness. To this he added a settled belief in the inspiration of the Scriptures and the governing providence of God, connected with highly reverential views of the divine character and perfections. Here he rested, placing his chief reliance for salvation on a faithful discharge of all the relative duties of life, though not to the entire exclusion of dependence on the merits of the Redeemer In this state of mind he remained, though with some misgiving and frequent fluctuations of feeling, to the winter of 1807–8. At that time, there was a season of general religious interest at New Haven, under the ministry of the Rev Moses Stuart, now a professor in the Andover Theological Seminary To this Dr Webster's attention was first directed by observing an unusual degree of tenderness and solemnity of feeling in all the adult members of his family He was thus led to reconsider his former views, and inquire, with an earnestness which he had never felt before, into the nature of personal religion, and the true ground of man's acceptance with God. He had now to decide not for himself only, but, to a certain extent, for others, whose spiritual interests were committed to his charge. Under a sense of this responsibility, he took up the study of the Bible with painful solicitude As he advanced, the objections which he had formerly entertained against the humbling doctrines of the gospel were wholly removed He felt their truth in his own experience He felt that salvation must be wholly of grace He felt constrained, as he afterward told a friend, to cast himself down before God, confess his sins, implore pardon through the merits of the Redeemer, and there to make his vows of entire obedience to the commands and devotion to the service of his Maker With his characteristic promptitude, he instantly made known to his family the feelings which he entertained He called them together the next morning, and told them, with deep emotion, that, while he had aimed at the faithful discharge of all his duties as their parent and head, he had neglected one of the most important — that of family prayer After reading the Scriptures, he led them, with deep solemnity, to the throne of grace, and from that time continued the practice, with the liveliest interest, to the period of his death He made a public profession of religion in April, 1808 His two oldest daughters united with him in the act, and another, only twelve years of age, was soon added to the number

In his religious feelings, Dr Webster was remarkably equable and cheerful He had a very strong sense of the providence of God, as extending to the minutest concerns of life In this he found a source of continual support and consolation, under the severe labors and numerous trials which he had to endure To the same divine hand he habitually referred all his enjoyments, and it was known to his family that he rarely, if ever, took the slightest refreshment, of any kind, even between meals, without a momentary pause, and a silent tribute to God as the giver He made the Scriptures his daily study After the completion of his Dictionary, especially, they were always lying on his table, and he probably read them more than all other books He felt, from that time, that the labors of his life were ended, and that little else remained but to prepare for death With a grateful sense of past mercies, a cheering consciousness of present support, and an animating hope of future blessedness, he waited with patience until his appointed change should come

During the spring of 1843, Dr Webster revised the Appendix of his Dictionary, and added some hundreds of words He completed the printing of it about the middle of May It was the closing act of his life His hand rested, in its last labors, on the volume which he had commenced thirty-six years before Within a few days, in calling on a number of friends in different parts of the town, he walked, during one afternoon, between two and three miles The day was chilly, and immediately after his return, he was seized with faintness and a severe oppression on his lungs. An attack of peripneumony followed, which, though not alarming at first, took a sudden turn after four or five days, with fearful indications of a fatal result. It soon became necessary to inform him that he was in imminent danger. He received the communication with surprise, but with entire composure. His health had been so good, and every bodily function so perfect in its exercise, that he undoubtedly expected to live some years longer. But though suddenly called, he was completely ready. He gave some characteristic directions as to the disposal of his body after death. He spoke of his long life as one of uniform enjoyment, because filled up at every stage with active labors for some valuable end. He expressed his entire resignation to the will of God, and his unshaken trust in the atoning blood of the Redeemer It was an interesting coincidence, that his former pastor, the Rev Mr Stuart, who received him to the church thirty-five years before, had just arrived at New Haven on a visit to his friends He called immediately, and the interview brought into affecting comparison the beginning and the end of that long period of consecration to the service of Christ The same hopes which had cheered the vigor of manhood were now shedding a softened light over the decay and sufferings of age "I know in whom I have believed," — such was the solemn and affecting testimony which he gave to his friend, while the hand of death was upon him, — "I know in whom I have believed, and that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day." Thus, without one doubt, one fear, he resigned his soul into the hands of his Maker, and died on the 28th day of May, 1843, in the eighty-fifth year of his age

In his person, Dr Webster was tall, and somewhat slender, remarkably erect throughout life, and moving, even in his advanced years, with a light and elastic step

Dr Webster's widow survived him more than four years, and died on the 25th day of June, 1847, in the eighty-second year of her age. He had seven children who arrived at maturity, — one son, William G Webster, Esq, who resides at New Haven, and six daughters Of these, the oldest is married to the Hon. William W Ellsworth, of Hartford, late governor, and now judge of the Supreme Court of Connecticut; the second to the author of this sketch, the third, now deceased, was first married to Edward Cobb, Esq, of Portland, Maine, and afterward to the Rev Professor Fowler, of Amherst, Mass, the fourth, also deceased, was married to Horatio Southgate, Esq, of Portland, Maine, and left at her death a daughter, who was adopted by Dr Webster, and is now married to Henry Trowbridge, Jun, Esq, of New Haven, the fifth is married to the Rev Henry Jones, of Bridgeport, Conn and the sixth remains unmarried, in the family of her brother

In conclusion, it may be said that the name of NOAH WEBSTER, from the wide circulation of some of his works, is known familiarly to a greater number of the inhabitants of the United States, than the name, probably, of any other individual except the FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY. Whatever influence he thus acquired was used at all times to promote the best interests of his fellow-men His books, though read by millions, have made no man worse To multitudes they have been of lasting benefit, not only by the course of early training they have furnished, but by those precepts of wisdom and virtue with which almost every page is stored

A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

By JAMES HADLEY, M. A.,

PROFESSOR OF THE GREEK LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE IN YALE COLLEGE.

LANGUAGES KINDRED TO THE ENGLISH.

§ 1. Anglo-Saxon, Teutonic, Indo-European. The English language is the descendant and representative of the Anglo Saxon. It has lost very much of the inflection, and very many of the words, which belonged to the parent language; and, on the other hand, it has borrowed words very largely, to the extent even of half its vocabulary, from other languages, especially the French and the Latin. Yet all the inflections that remain in it, and most of its formative endings, the pronouns and particles, and, in general, the words which are in most frequent and familiar use, have come to it from the Anglo-Saxon. With all its mixture of foreign elements, it is still a Teutonic language, like the German, Dutch, Swedish, Danish, and others. These again make one branch in that great family of languages, which, as it extends from India westward, and covers nearly the entire area of Europe, is called Indo-European. Among all families of kindred tongues, the Indo European is pre-eminent, both for the perfection of its organic structure, and for the value of its literary monuments. The parent of the whole family, the one primitive Indo-European language, has left no such monument of itself, but its forms and roots may be made out, to a great extent, by the scientific comparison of the languages which are descended from it. The main branches of the Indo European family are the following: —

§ 2. I. The INDIAN. The Sanskrit of the four Vedas, the sacred books of the Brahman religion, is more ancient than the common or classical Sanskrit. Even the latter had ceased to be the language of common life as early as the third century before Christ. It was succeeded by the Prakrit dialects, one of which, the Pali, is the sacred language of the Buddhists in Ceylon and Further India. These, in their turn, were succeeded by the modern idioms of Northern Hindustan, the Bengali, Marathi, Guzerathi, and others. The Hindustani (or Urdu), formed in the camps and courts of the Mohammedan conquerors of India, is largely intermixed with Persian and Arabic. The widely scattered Gypsies speak, with great diversity of dialect, a language which is clearly of Indian stock.

§ 3. II. The IRANIAN. To this branch belong, 1. The Zend, which is believed to have been the language of ancient Bactria, and is preserved in the Avesta, or sacred writings of the Parsis. 2. The Old Persian, which is seen in the cuneiform (or arrow headed) inscriptions of Darius and Xerxes. The modern Persian has lost nearly all the ancient inflection, and with the Mohammedan religion has adopted a multitude of words from the Arabic. Other languages belonging to this branch are those of the Kurds, the Afghans, the Ossetes (in the Caucasus), and the ancient and modern Armenians. The Indian and Iranian are often classed together as forming the Indo Persian or Aryan branch of our family.

§ 4. III. The GREEK. Of its numerous dialects, the first to receive literary culture was the Old Ionic or Epic, followed by the Aolic, the Doric, the New Ionic, and finally the Attic, which became, at length, though with some change of form, the common language of literature and society. It is represented now by the Romaic, or Modern Greek. The Albanian, spoken in a large part of modern Greece, is supposed to be a descendant of the ancient Illyrian.

§ 5. IV. The LATIN. This is often joined with the preceding, as the Greco-Latin, or Classical branch. Closely akin to Latin were the other Italican languages — the Oscan, Umbrian, etc. — in Central Italy. The modern descendants of the Latin are called the Romance languages. They are the Italian, the Spanish, the Portuguese, the Provençal (of Southern France, used in the middle ages as a literary language), and the French (originally the popular dialect of Northern France). All these contain a small proportion of Teutonic words, brought in by the barbarian conquerors of the Western Roman Empire. But another Romance language — that of the Wallachians, the descendants of the Romanized Dacians — is largely intermixed with borrowed words, taken chiefly from the neighboring Slavonic tribes.

§ 6. V. The CELTIC. This branch is divided by strongly-marked differences into two sections: 1. The Gaelic, including the Irish (or native language of Ireland), the Erse (or Highland Scotch), and the Manx (the corrupt idiom of the Isle of Man). The last two are little more than dialects of the Irish. 2. The Cymric, including the Welsh (or native language of Wales), the Cornish (which was spoken in Cornwall, but went out of use in the last century), and the Armorican (spoken in the French province of Brittany, the ancient Armorica). The oldest manuscript specimens of the Gaelic belong to the close of the eighth century; for the Cymric, the oldest which are at all copious, are three or four centuries later.

§ 7. VI. The SLAVONIC. The earliest monument is the version of the Bible, made in the ninth century, by the Greek missionaries Cyril and Methodius, into the Old Slavonic, the idiom spoken by the Bulgarians of that time. This widely-diffused class of languages divides itself into two principal sections. 1. The eastern and southern Slavonic, including the Russian, the Bulgarian, and the three Illyrian idioms, Servian, Croatian, and Slovenic. 2. The western Slavonic, including the Polish, the Bohemian (with the Moravian and Slovack dialects), the Lusatian or Wendish, and the extinct Polabian.

§ 8. VII. The LITHUANIAN. The language of Lithuania has no monuments older than the middle of the sixteenth century, but it has preserved in a surprising degree the ancient inflection and structure. To the same stock belong the Lettish of Courland and Livonia, which is much less ancient in its form, and the Old Prussian, which was once spoken on the coast of the Baltic east of the Vistula, but became extinct in the seventeenth century. The connection between this and the preceding branch is such that they are often classed together as the Letto Slavic languages.

§ 9. VIII. The TEUTONIC. Here again the earliest monument is a version of the Bible, made by Ulfilas, an Arian bishop of the fourth century, into his native Gothic (or Mœso Gothic), the language spoken at that time by the Goths on the Lower Danube. This work is preserved only in fragments, but these are of considerable extent, and are of inestimable value to the philologist. Among the Teutonic languages we distinguish, —

§ 10. 1. The High German, in Upper or Southern Germany. The Old High German is seen in Otfrid's Krist, Notker's Translation of the Psalms, and other monuments, most of them in verse, from the eighth century to the end of the eleventh. The Middle High German, from the twelfth to the fifteenth century, has a rich poetical literature, including the Nibelungen Not with its attendant epics, and the lyric poetry of the Minnesinger. The New High German is the language of Luther's Bible-version and of all German literature since the Reformation.

§ 11. 2. The Low German, in Northern Germany and the Netherlands. Here belong, (a) The Frisic, which was once spoken along the whole northern coast of Germany, from the Elbe westward. Its early monuments consist almost wholly of laws, beginning with the fourteenth century. For a long time it has existed only as a popular idiom, and is now confined to a few small and scattered localities. (b) The Anglo-Saxon, sometimes called simply Saxon, which in the fifth and sixth centuries was transplanted from North-eastern Germany to Britain, and has had its subsequent development and history in that Island. (c) The Old Saxon, which was spoken in Northern Germany between the Rhine and the Elbe, south of the narrow sea-coast region, which was occupied by the Frisic. It is known almost solely from the Heliand, or Savior, a metrical narration of the gospel history, preserved in manuscripts of the ninth century. The language of the Netherlands in the same period can not have differed much from the Old Saxon which may be regarded as the common parent of the two following idioms. (d) The Dutch, or Low Dutch spoken in Holland, and used in literature since the last part of the thirteenth century. The Flemish, spoken in Flanders, is a dialect of the Dutch. (e) The Low German strictly so called (or Plattdeutsch), the idiom of the common people in Northern Germany. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, it was used as a literary language, but political circumstances, giving ascendency to the High German, have reduced it to the inferior position of a popular dialect.

§ 12. 3. The Norse, or Scandinavian. The Old Norse is also called Old Icelandic, as most of its abundant literature (Eddas, Sagas, etc.) was composed in Iceland. The oldest manuscripts in which it is preserved are of the thirteenth century, but many of its productions are of earlier origin, going back even to the heathen times of Scandinavia. The modern Icelandic has adhered with remarkable fidelity to the forms of the ancient language. But the modern idioms of the Scandinavian mainland, the Swedish, and, still more, the Danish (of which the Norwegian is only a dialect), have undergone extensive change.

§ 13. Languages not kindred to the English. The Indo European family has no isolated domain, but comes in contact with various other families of languages. It is bounded along its whole northern frontier by the Tartaric (or Tataric) family (called also the Turanian, or the Altaic), which includes the numerous and widely different languages of the Manchoos, the Mongols, the Turks (in Asia and Europe), the Magyars (in Hungary), the Finns, and a multitude of other tribes. To the south-east, it touches on the so-called Dravidian family, the Tamil and its sister idioms in Ceylon and Southern India. In South western Asia it is in contact with a more remarkable family, — the Semitic, — including the

Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic, with their ancient and important literatures. Even in South-western Europe, it is doubtful whether the ancient Etruscan belonged to our family It is perfectly clear that the ancient Iberian did not belong to it, which was once the prevailing language of the Spanish peninsula, and which still lives, on the two sides of the Pyrenees, in the strange language called Basque (Biscayan, or Euscarra) Whether the Indo-European has a primitive connection with any of the adjacent families, is a question which has not been, and perhaps never will be, decided by philological evidence At all events, it is certain that between Welsh and Sanskrit, distant as they are in space and time, there is an infinitely closer connection than between the neighboring paths of Russian and Finnish, German and Hungarian, or Greek and Hebrew It is true that some languages of our family have borrowed particular words from languages of other families The English, for example, has taken from the Hebrew such words as shekel, cherub, seraph, jubilee, pharisee, cabala, etc, and from some of them has formed derivatives, such as seraphic, jubilant, pharisaical, pharisaism, cabalist, cabalistical, etc But this borrowing can only occur where there are historical conditions that favor it even then it has its limits and its distinctive marks, and must not be confounded with a radical affinity between two languages All etymologizing which assumes or implies a radical affinity between English and Hebrew, English and Finnish, or the like, is, in the present state of philology, unscientific and illusory

GENERAL FEATURES OF THE TEUTONIC LANGUAGES, PARTICULARLY THE ANGLO-SAXON

§ 14 Progression of Mutes In examining the sounds of the Teutonic languages we find that the primitive Indo European mutes have undergone a remarkable series of changes Thus, the rough mutes of the primitive language, bh, dh, gh (Greek φ, θ, χ), have in the Gothic passed into the middle mutes, b, d, g the primitive middle mutes, b, d, g, into the smooth, p, t, k, and the primitive smooth mutes, p, t, k, into the rough, f, th (þ), h The other Teutonic languages agree in this respect with the Gothic But the High German has gone one step further It has changed the Gothic b, d, g, into p, t, k, the Gothic p, t, k, into f, z (for th), ch, and the Gothic th (þ) into d But the Middle and New High German (as, in part, also the Old High German) have the Gothic b and g, without change To these rules the exceptions are somewhat numerous in part, they depend on special laws, — thus, after s, the primitive smooth mutes remain unchanged, — but other cases still appear as anomalous Yet the general validity of the rules admits of no doubt The following examples will serve as illustrations —

Greek	Latin	Gothic	Eng	O H Ger	N H Ger
φρατηρ	frater	brôthar	brother	pruodar	bruder
θυρα	fores	daur	door	tôr	thor (=tôr)

κανναβις	cannabis		hemp	hanaf	hanf
στῆναι	sta-re	standan	stand	stantan	steh-en

§ 15 Variation of Vowels It is a thing of familiar occurrence in all the Teutonic languages, that the same root appears with a variety of vowel sounds, as in sing sang, sung, song bind, bound, band, bond Similar variations of vowel-sound are met with in other languages What is peculiar to the Teutonic is the frequency and regularity with which they are used as a means for the inflection and formation of words They appear thus most frequently and regularly in the earliest Teutonic idioms, many words which had them in the Anglo Saxon have lost them in the English Different from these variations of vowel is that attenuation, or change from a more open vowel sound to a closer, which we see in man, men, foot, feet, mouse, mice This change, which is unknown to the Gothic, has arisen from the influence of a close vowel, i or e, belonging to an inflection ending, which has dropped off from the English men, feet, mice, but which is still heard in the German plurals, männer, fässer, mäuse

§ 16 Numbers The Indo European inflection distinguished three numbers, singular, plural, and dual In the Teutonic languages, the dual form of the noun has wholly disappeared that of the verb appears only in the Gothic, and there only in the first and second persons The pronouns of the same persons show a dual form, not only in the Gothic, but also in the Anglo-Saxon thus A-S wit, we two, unc, us two, git, ye two, inc, you two, but in the plural we, us, ge (ye) eow (you), as in English

§ 17 Genders The Indo European system of gender seems to have commenced with some differences of inflection between the names of personal and those of impersonal objects Among the first, certain forms of inflection were afterward appropriated to the names of female persons The result was a threefold system of gender, corresponding to the real distinctions of sex But its character was modified, almost from the outset, in two different ways First, many objects which are without sex were thought of as having in their attributes an analogy to male or female persons, and accordingly received masculine or feminine inflection, and second, in some cases, objects which have sex were thought of without special reference to sex, and accordingly received neuter inflection Thus, the system of grammatical gender assumed to a great extent a fictitious, and even an arbitrary, character This system had become fully developed before the separation of the Indo-European family, and it is found, essentially unchanged, not only in the Gothic and the Anglo-Saxon, but even in the modern German In the English, on the contrary, it has almost entirely disappeared the same forms of the article, the adjective, and even of the pronoun, are used for all kinds of objects The only distinction is in the personal pronoun of the third person, where in the singular we use special forms (he, she, his, her him, her) in reference to male and female objects But in the Anglo Saxon, he is used in referring to se mona, the moon, se stân, the stone, as well as se cyning, the king, heo (she), in referring to seo sunne, the sun, seo spræc, the speech, as well as seo swuster, the sister, hit (it), in referring to that heafod, the head, but also to thät bearn, the child, and even thät wif, the woman, wife

§ 18 Cases The Indo European had eight cases, the nominative, for the subject of a sentence, the accusative, for the direct object, the dative, for the indirect object (to or for which something is done), the genitive, or of case, the ablative, or from case, the instrumental, or with-case (denoting either association or instrument), the locative, or in case, and, finally, the vocative, or interjectional case, which does not enter into the construction of the sentence Of these, the ablative and locative are nowhere found in the Teutonic languages The vocative, which is not wanting in the Gothic, is scarcely known to the Anglo Saxon The instrumental, which has nearly disappeared in the Gothic, is seen in the inflection of Anglo Saxon adjectives and demonstratives The remaining four cases, the nominative, accusative, dative, and genitive, are common to all the older Teutonic languages, and are still distinguished in the modern German The English distinguishes nominative and accusative only in the personal pronouns in substantives, it has the genitive (though in the plural commonly without a distinct form), but confines it almost wholly to the possessive relation

§ 19 Declensions The Anglo Saxon like the other Teutonic languages, has two schemes of noun inflection which may be termed the Vowel Declension, and the N Declension they are often called strong and weak declensions The few Anglo Saxon substantives which do not agree with either of these schemes may be treated as anomalous But different from both is the Pronominal Declension, seen in the demonstrative and most other pronouns One of the most remarkable peculiarities of the Teutonic is the fact that every adjective is inflected in two ways it follows the pronominal declension when its substantive is indefinite but if the substantive is definite, as when it is connected with the definite article, or with a demonstrative or possessive pronoun, the adjective follows the N-declension Thus the Anglo Saxon has wis cyning, a wise king, genitive wises cyninges, dative wisum cyninge gôd nama, a good name, genitive gôdes naman, dative gôdum naman, but se wisa cyning, the wise king, genitive thas wisan cyninges, dative tham wisan cyninge, se gôda nama, the good name, genitive thas gôdan naman, dative tham gôdan naman This distinction of the definite and indefinite adjective is preserved in modern German, but is wholly lost in modern English In substantives, the English still shows a trace of the N-declension, in a few plurals like oxen children, brethren, kine though all of these, except oxen, are Old English blunders, the n being misapplied to words that did not have it in the Anglo Saxon

§ 20 Voices. The Teutonic verb, when compared with the Indo European, shows extensive losses It has but one voice, the active, having given up the middle (or reflexive) voice, and the passive In the Gothic, indeed we still find the ancient middle, formed as in the Greek, and used generally in a passive sense it is continued, however, to the present tense, and shows by other signs that it was beginning to disappear from the language In the past tense of the Gothic, and in both tenses of the other old Germanic idioms, the place of a passive verb was supplied by using the passive participle, sometimes with the verb which means to be (Goth wisan, A S wesan or beon, etc), and sometimes with the verb which means to become (Goth vairthan, A S weordhan, Old Eng worth in woe worth the day) In all the modern Germanic idioms, except the English, only the latter verb (Ger werden, Dutch worden, etc) is used to make up the passive The English alone, doubtless under French influence, has fixed upon the verb to be for this purpose The Danish and Swedish have a passive made by adding s to the forms of the active But for this s the Old Icelandic has sk, and in the earliest manuscripts sk, which is plainly the reflexive pronoun sik (self, selves) shortened and added to the active verb Here, as in many other languages, the passive was originally reflexive

§ 21 Modes and Tenses The Teutonic verb has three finite modes, the indicative, the subjunctive (Greek optative, Sanskrit potential), and the imperative the second of these has, to a great extent, disappeared in modern English It has also an infinitive, and a participle active and passive, which are essentially verbal nouns Of the primitive modes, it wants only the one which is represented by the Greek subjunctive Of tenses, it has lost the primitive imperfect, future, and aorist, retaining only the present and the perfect The reduplication of the perfect (seen in Greek λε λυ-κα, Latin tu tud-i) is preserved by the Gothic in a few verbs, as haitan haihait, hold, in the other idioms we find little more than traces of its former existence

§ 22 Persons and Numbers There is good reason to believe that the personal endings were in their origin pronouns, appended to the verb, and denoting its subject The Gothic, in general, distinguishes the three persons of the singular and those of the plural by as many different endings The Anglo-Saxon confounds the three persons in the plural of the indicative, and in both numbers of the subjunctive, but still distinguishes between the singular and the plural Even this last distinction is, to a great extent, lost in modern English. The Teutonic imperative has only a second person.

§ 23. Verbs of Primary and Secondary Inflection. The Teutonic verbs divide themselves into two well-marked classes, which may be called verbs of primary, and verbs of secondary, inflection they are often called verbs of strong and of weak inflection To the first class belong words like fall, fell, know, knew, swear, swore, drive, drove, choose, chose, lie, lay, come, came, sing, sang, etc In these, the past tense adds nothing, except personal endings, after the root or stem of the verb They are further characterized by that variation of the radical vowel (internal inflection), which has been already noticed as a striking peculiarity of the Teutonic To the second class belong words like kill, killed, lie, lied, lay, laid, lead, led (for leaded), leave, left (for leaved), have, had (for haved), make, made (for maked), etc In these, the past tense adds d (in High German, t) to the root or stem Only a few of them have also the change of radical vowel, as sell, sold, bring, brought, etc In most forms of the Gothic perfect, this d is doubled, as in lag ɔ-dedum, we laid, lag ɔ deduth, ye laid, etc apparently it is the reduplicated perfect of a verb corresponding to our do, thus lag ɔ dedum = lay-did we, we made a laying In Gothic, this class embraces the derivative words, while nearly all primitive verbs have the inflection of the first class But the tendency in all Teutonic languages has been to increase the second class at the expense of the first Many Anglo Saxon verbs of the first class belong in Old English to the second thus, A-S wealdan, to wield, pf weold, but O Eng welded lifan, to leave, laf, O Eng left, leosan, to lose, leas, O Eng lost And many Old English verbs of the first class belong in modern English to the second thus, O Eng shope (pf of shape), now shaped, O Eng glode (pf of glide), now glided, O Eng gnon (pf of gnaw), now gnawed The result of these changes is, that in modern English, the verbs of the first class, when compared with those of the second, have the appearance of anomalous and capricious exceptions to a general law of inflection

THE ANGLO-SAXON AS A LITERARY LANGUAGE

§ 24 Name The emigrants from Germany, who invaded Britain in the fifth and sixth centuries, and after long struggles conquered most of the island, appear to have come in great part from the districts now called Sleswick and Holstein, on the eastern shores of the North Sea The Angles, who seem to have been the most numerous portion, established themselves in the east and north of Britain, but left the Scottish Highlands to their Gaelic population The Saxons occupied the south and west, but left Wales and Cornwall to their Cymric population A third fraction, of far inferior numbers, the Jutes, had possession of Kent in the south east of England There is reason to believe that there was a difference of dialect among these settlers, and, particularly, that the idiom of the Angles varied in some degree from that of the Saxons but it can not well be doubted that they all spoke substantially the same language This common language bears a close resemblance to the Frisic and to the Old Saxon, holding in some respects an intermediate position between them In its literary monuments, it is sometimes designated as the Saxon, sometimes as the English (Anglisc, belonging to the Angles), but the latter became at length the established name for the language, as England (Engla land, land of the Angles) for the country The name Anglo-Saxon, which recognizes the claims of both parties, is of later introduction

§ 25 Alliterative Verse There was no written Anglo-Saxon literature until after the conversion of the people to Christianity The earliest productions were poetical, and, like all Anglo Saxon poetry, indeed like all early Teutonic poetry, they are alliterative The verses are not confined to a uniform number of syllables or succession of accents, nor do they have final rhyme But in each couplet of two short lines, several prominent words, two, three, or four, either all begin with the same consonant, or all begin with vowels, which are not required to be the same In the most common arrangement, there are three alliterative words in the couplet, two in the first line, and one in the second A word which has an unaccented prefix is treated as if the prefix were no part of it To illustrate the description, we subjoin what is perhaps the earliest specimen of Anglo Saxon verse, the opening lines of Cædmon's Scripture paraphrase, as they are quoted by Bede We mark the initial letter of the alliterative words In the annexed translation, other objects are sacrificed in order to represent the alliteration

§ 26. Works of Poetry and Prose. Among the longer Anglo Saxon poems, the most remarkable is the epic called Beowulf, from the name of its Danish hero It is preserved in a manuscript of the tenth century, but is certainly much more ancient in its origin In substance, it must have come down from heathen times, though the form in which we have it shows the work of Christian hands We have also a long series of Scripture narratives in Anglo Saxon verse these, too, are found in a manuscript of the tenth century, but they have been generally regarded as productions of Cædmôn, a monk who lived in the last half of the seventh A manuscript of the eighth century contains the last two thirds of a metrical version of the Psalms, which may perhaps be the work of Aldhelm of Malmesbury, a contemporary of Cædmon Of shorter poems, the most interesting are the Traveler's Song, the Death of Byrhtnoth, Athelstan's Victory at Brunanburh, the very peculiar and artificial Rhyming Song, and a collection of metrical enigmas most of these poems are preserved in the famous Exeter manuscript of the eleventh century In prose, besides versions of different parts of the Bible, the most important works are the translations made from the Latin by King Alfred in the ninth century (including the History of Orosius, the Ecclesiastical History of Bede, and Boethius on the Consolations of Philosophy), the Homilies of Alfric, who was Archbishop of Canterbury in the earlier part of the eleventh century, and the Saxon Chronicle, in which the principal events of Anglo Saxon times are recorded in the form of dry and meagre annals, apparently by several successive writers, the last of whom wrote about a century after the Norman conquest.

INFLUENCE OF OTHER LANGUAGES ON THE ANGLO-SAXON

§ 27 The Celtic The Saxons and Angles, when they entered Britain, were brought into contact with a Celtic speaking population It is true that the Latin had been spoken by the dominant people in England during more than three centuries of Roman occupation But it seems not to have established itself, as it did in Gaul and Spain, so as to supplant the native language of the country It had rather the position which was afterward held on the same ground by its own child, the French, for more than two centuries after the Norman conquest It was spoken by the ruling caste, while the mass of the people adhered to their own mother tongue, though they naturally received into it, as time passed on, a considerable number of words learned from their rulers In Wales, which has retained the same population from Roman times, the vernacular idiom is not of Latin origin, nor is it very largely intermixed with Latin it is true and genuine Celtic The probability is, that the great body of those whose possessions passed into Anglo Saxon hands spoke substantially the same language This being so, it would not have seemed strange if the idiom of the conquered people had acted on that of the conquerors, so as to introduce a large Celtic element into Anglo Saxon and English But the fact is quite the contrary The Celtic words in English are altogether few in number most of them—as bard, druid, crowd (a fiddle), etc —belong to objects which are specially Celtic, and a large part—including nearly all those of Gaelic origin, as brogue, clan, shanty, whisky etc —are of recent introduction It should seem that in the slow and gradual progress of the Saxon conquests, the native British fell back from point to point before the invaders or if a part remained in their old homes, they were too few to maintain their old language and had to exchange it for the Saxon while the independent Britons and the Saxons, engaged in constant hostilities, were cut off from that free and peaceful intercourse which might have left a marked impress on the languages of both There have been, indeed, etymologists who regarded a large number of English words as borrowed from the primitive British But in many of the cases brought forward, there is no real connection between the words compared Thus A-S cûth, known (seen in Eng un couth), has nothing to do with Welsh gwyddd, knowledge, gwyddd stands, by Welsh euphony, for earlier guidd which corresponds to Lat vid eo, Eng wit (as verb, to know) while cûth is identical with Germ kund, and comes from the root seen in our ken and know In many other cases, there is a real connection, but no borrowing, the words having come down both in the Teutonic and the Celtic from the common Indo-European stock Thus baron, which has been identified with W bardd, is really derived from the root of the verb to bear, Goth bairan, Lat fero while bardd, if not taken from the English, was formed on Celtic ground from the same root, as seen in Ir bairim For in many cases, when borrowing has occurred, it has clearly been in the opposite direction, by the Celtic from the English, or from the French or the Latin Thus the English solder and locker do not come from the Welsh sawdurwaw and llogell, but have other satisfactory etymologies while sawdurwaw is plainly taken from the English, and llogell (= locker) is simply the Latin loculus There remain, however, a small number of words—such as basket, glen, lad, dun (color), etc —in which an early borrowing from the Welsh is either certain or probable But the words bran, cabin, puce, quay, and a few others like them, if they are really of Celtic origin, have not come to us directly from the Celtic, but have passed from a Celtic source into the Romance languages, and from thence into the English

§ 28 The Latin The introduction of Christianity among the Anglo Saxons at the opening of the seventh century, brought with it the study of the Latin The cultivation of learning and letters belonged almost exclusively to ecclesiastics, with whom Latin was the professional language Hence quite a number of Latin or Latinized Greek words, most of them words connected with church or religion, passed into the Anglo-Saxon, thus —

Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic, with their ancient and important literatures Even in South-western Europe, it is doubtful whether the ancient Etruscan belonged to our family It is perfectly clear that the ancient Iberian did not belong to it, which was once the prevailing language of the Spanish peninsula, and which still lives, on the two sides of the Pyrenees, in the strange language called Basque (Biscayan, or Euscarra) Whether the Indo-European has a primitive connection with any of the adjacent families, is a question which has not been, and perhaps never will be, decided by philological evidence At all events, it is certain that between Welsh and Sanskrit, distant as they are in space and time, there is an infinitely closer connection than between the neighboring pairs of Russian and Finnish, German and Hungarian, or Greek and Hebrew It is true that some languages of our family have borrowed particular words from languages of other families The English, for example, has taken from the Hebrew such words as shekel, cherub, seraph, jubilee, pharisee, cabala, etc , and from some of them has formed derivatives, such as seraphic, jubilant, pharisaical, pharisaism, cabalist, cabalistical, etc But this borrowing can only occur where there are historical conditions that favor it even then it has its limits and its distinctive marks, and must not be confounded with a radical affinity between two languages All etymologizing which assumes or implies a radical affinity between English and Hebrew, English and Finnish, or the like, is, in the present state of philology, unscientific and illusory.

GENERAL FEATURES OF THE TEUTONIC LANGUAGES, PARTICULARLY THE ANGLO-SAXON

§ 14 Progression of Mutes In examining the sounds of the Teutonic languages we find that the primitive Indo European mutes have undergone a remarkable series of changes Thus, the rough mutes of the primitive language, bh, dh, gh (Greek φ, θ, χ), have in the Gothic passed into the middle mutes, b, d, g the primitive middle mutes, b, d, g, into the smooth, p, t, k, and the primitive smooth mutes, p, t, k, into the rough, f, th (þ), h The other Teutonic languages agree in this respect with the Gothic But the High German has gone one step further It has changed the Gothic b, d, g, into p, t, k the Gothic p, t, k, into f, z (for th), ch, and the Gothic th (þ) into d. But the Middle and New High German (as, in part, also the Old High German) have the Gothic b and g, without change To these rules the exceptions are somewhat numerous in part they depend on special laws, — thus, after s, the primitive smooth mutes remain unchanged, — but other cases still appear as anomalous Yet the general validity of the rules admits of no doubt The following examples will serve as illustrations —

§ 15 Variation of Vowels It is a thing of familiar occurrence in all the Teutonic languages, that the same root appears with a variety of vowel-sounds, as in sing, sang, sung, song, bind, bound, band, bond Similar variations of vowel sound are met with in other languages What is peculiar to the Teutonic is the frequency and regularity with which they are used as a means for the inflection and formation of words They appear thus most frequently and regularly in the earliest Teutonic idioms, many words which had them in the Anglo Saxon have lost them in the English Different from these variations of vowel is that after-mutation, or change from a more open vowel-sound to a closer, which we see in man, men, foot, feet, mouse, mice This change, which is unknown to the Gothic, has arisen from the influence of a close vowel, i or e, belonging to an inflection ending, which has dropped off from the English men, feet, mice, but which is still heard in the German plurals, männer, füsse, mäuse

§ 16 Numbers The Indo European inflection distinguished three numbers, singular, plural, and dual In the Teutonic languages, the dual form of the noun has wholly disappeared that of the verb appears only in the Gothic, and there only in the first and second persons The pronouns of the same persons show a dual form, not only in the Gothic, but also in the Anglo Saxon thus A-S wit, we two, unc, us two, git, ye two, inc, you two, but in the plural we, ûs, ge (ye) eow (you), as in English

§ 17 Genders The Indo European system of gender seems to have commenced with some differences of inflection between the names of personal and those of impersonal objects Among the first, certain forms of inflection were afterward appropriated to the names of female persons The result was a three fold system of gender, corresponding to the real distinctions of sex But its character was modified, almost from the outset, in two different ways first, many objects which are without sex were thought of as having in their attributes an analogy to male or female persons, and accordingly received masculine or feminine inflection, and second, in some cases, objects which have sex were thought of without special reference to sex, and accordingly received neuter inflection Thus, the system of grammatical gender assumed to a great extent a fictitious, and even an arbitrary, character This system had become fully developed before the separation of the Indo-European family, and it is found, essentially unchanged, not only in the Gothic and the Anglo Saxon, but even in the modern German In the English, on the contrary, it has almost entirely disappeared the same forms of the article, the adjective, and even of the pronoun, are used for all kinds of objects The only distinction is in the personal pronoun of the third person, where in the singular we use special forms (he, she, his, her, him, her) in reference to male and female objects But in the Anglo Saxon, he is used in referring to se mona, the moon, se stân, the stone, as well as se cyning, the king, heo (she), in referring to seo sunne, the sun, seo sprǽc, the speech, as well as seo sweostor, the sister, hit (it), in referring to thät heafod, the head, but also to thät bearn, the child, and even thät wif, the woman, wife

§ 18 Cases The Indo European had eight cases, the nominative, for the subject of a sentence, the accusative, for the direct object, the dative, for the indirect object (to or for which something is done), the genitive, or of case, the ablative, or from case, the instrumental, or with case (denoting either association or instrument), the locative, or in case, and, finally, the vocative, or interjectional case, which does not enter into the construction of the sentence Of these, the ablative and locative are nowhere found in the Teutonic languages The vocative, which is not wanting in the Gothic, is scarcely known to the Anglo-Saxon The instrumental, which has nearly disappeared in the Gothic, is seen in the inflection of Anglo Saxon adjectives and demonstratives The remaining four cases, the nominative, accusative, dative, and genitive, are common to all the older Teutonic languages, and are still distinguished in the modern German The English distinguishes nominative and accusative only in the personal pronouns in substantives, it has the genitive (though in the plural commonly without a distinct form), but confines it almost wholly to the possessive relation

§ 19 Declensions The Anglo Saxon like the other Teutonic languages, has two schemes of noun inflection, which may be termed the Vocal Declension, and the N Declension they are often called strong and weak declensions The few Anglo Saxon substantives which do not agree with either of these schemes may be treated as anomalous But different from both is the Pronominal Declension, seen in the demonstrative and most other pronouns One of the most remarkable peculiarities of the Teutonic is the fact that every adjective is inflected in two ways it follows the pronominal declension when its substantive is indefinite but if the substantive is definite, as when it is connected with the definite article, or with a demonstrative or possessive pronoun, the adjective follows the N declension Thus the Anglo Saxon has wes cyning, a wise king, genitive wises cyninges, dative wisum cyninge gód nama a good name, genitive gódes naman, dative gódum naman, but se wisa cyning, the wise king, genitive thäs wisan cyninges, dative thæm wisan cyninge, se góda nama, the good name, genitive thæs gódan naman, dative thæm gódan naman This distinction of the definite and indefinite adjective is preserved in modern German, but is wholly lost in modern English In substantives, the English still shows a trace of the N declension, in a few plurals like oxen, children, brethren, kine though all of these, except oxen, are Old English blunders, the n being misapplied to words that did not have it in the Anglo Saxon

§ 20 Voices. The Teutonic verb, when compared with the Indo European, shows extensive losses It has but one voice the active having given up the middle (or reflexive) voice and the passive In the Gothic indeed, we still find the ancient middle, formed as in the Greck, and used generally in a passive sense it is confined, however, to the present tense, and shows by other signs that it was beginning to disappear from the language In the past tense of the Gothic, and in both tenses of the other old Germanic idioms, the place of a passive verb was supplied by using the passive participle, sometimes with the verb which means to be (Goth wisan, A S wesan, or beon, etc), and sometimes with the verb which means to become (Goth vairthan, A S weordhan, Old Eng worth in woe worth the day) In all the modern Germanic idioms, except the English, only the latter verb (Ger werden Dutch worden, etc) is used to make up the passive The English alone doubtless under French influence, has fixed upon the verb to be for this purpose The Danish and Swedish have a passive made by adding s to the forms of the active But for this s the Old Icelandic has st and in the earliest manuscripts sk which is plainly the reflexive pronoun sik (self, selves) shortened and added to the active verb Here, as in many other languages, the passive was originally reflexive

§ 21 Modes and Tenses The Teutonic verb has three finite modes, the indicative, the subjunctive (Greek optative, Sanskrit potential), and the imperative the second of these has, to a great extent, disappeared in modern English It has also an infinitive, and a participle active and passive, which are essentially verbal nouns Of the primitive modes, it wants only the one which is represented by the Greek subjunctive Of tenses, it has lost the primitive imperfect, future, and aorist, retaining only the present and the perfect The reduplication of the perfect (seen in Greek λε λυ κα, Latin te tud i) is preserved by the Gothic in a few verbs, as hai hald, held, in the other idioms we find little more than traces of its former existence

§ 22 Persons and Numbers There is good reason to believe that the personal endings were in their origin pronouns, appended to the verb, and denoting its subject The Gothic, in general, distinguishes the three persons of the singular and those of the plural by as many different endings. The Anglo-Saxon confounds the three persons in the plural of the indicative, and in both numbers of the subjunctive, but still distinguishes between the singular and the plural. Even this last distinction is, to a great extent, lost in modern English. The Teutonic imperative has only a second person.

§ 23. Verbs of Primary and Secondary Inflection. The Teutonic verbs divide themselves into two well-marked classes, which may be called verbs of primary, and verbs of secondary, inflection they are often called verbs of strong and of weak inflection To the first class belong words like full, fell, know, knew, swear, swore, drive, drove, choose, chose, lie, lay, come, came, sing, sang, etc In these, the past tense adds nothing, except personal endings, after the root or stem of the verb They are further characterized by that variation of the radical vowel (internal inflection), which has been already noticed as a striking peculiarity of the Teutonic To the second class belong words like kill, killed, lie, lied, lay, laid, lead, led (for leaded), leave, left (for leaved), have, had (for haved), make, made (for maked), etc In these, the past tense adds d (in High German, t) to the root or stem Only a few of them have also the change of radical vowel, as sell, sold, bring, brought, etc In most forms of the Gothic perfect, this d is doubled, as in lag i dedum, we laid, lag-i deduth, ye laid, etc apparently it is the reduplicated perfect of a verb corresponding to our do, thus lag i dedum = lay-did-we, we made a laying In Gothic, this class embraces the derivative words, while nearly all primitive verbs have the inflection of the first class But the tendency in all Teutonic languages has been to increase the second class at the expense of the first Many Anglo Saxon verbs of the first class belong in Old English to the second thus, A-S wealdan, to wield, pf weold, but O Eng welded lifan, to leave, lâf, O Eng left, leosan, to lose, leas, O Eng lost And many Old English verbs of the first class belong in modern English to the second thus, O Eng shope (pf of shape), now shaped, O Eng glode (pf of glide), now glided, O Eng gnow (pf of gnaw), now gnawed The result of these changes is, that in modern English, the verbs of the first class, when compared with those of the second, have the appearance of anomalous and capricious exceptions to a general law of inflection.

THE ANGLO-SAXON AS A LITERARY LANGUAGE

§ 24 Name The emigrants from Germany, who invaded Britain in the fifth and sixth centuries, and after long struggles conquered most of the island appear to have come in great part from the districts now called Sleswick and Holstein, on the eastern shores of the North Sea The Angles, who seem to have been the most numerous portion, established themselves in the east and north of Britain, but left the Scottish Highlands to their Gaelic population The Saxons occupied the south and west, but left Wales and Cornwall to their Cymric population A third fraction, of far inferior numbers, the Jutes, had possession of Kent in the south east of England There is reason to believe that there was a difference of dialect among these settlers, and particularly, that the idiom of the Angles varied in some degree from that of the Saxons but it can not well be doubted that they all spoke substantially the same language Thus common language bears a close resemblance to the Friesic and to the Old Saxon, holding in some respects an intermediate position between them In its literary monuments, it is sometimes designated as the Saxon, sometimes as the English (Englisc, belonging to the Angles), but the latter became at length the established name for the language, as England (Engla land, land of the Angles) for the country The name Anglo-Saxon, which recognizes the claims of both parties, is of later introduction

§ 25. Alliterative Verse. There was no written Anglo Saxon literature until after the conversion of the people to Christianity The earliest productions were poetical, and, like all Anglo Saxon poetry, indeed like all early Teutonic poetry, they are alliterative The verses are not confined to a uniform number of syllables or succession of accents, nor do they have final rhyme But in each couplet of two short lines, several prominent words two, three, or four, either all begin with the same consonant, or all begin with vowels, which are not required to be the same In the most common arrangement, there are three alliterative words in the couplet, two in the first line and one in the second A word which has an unaccented prefix is treated as if the prefix were no part of it To illustrate the description, we subjoin what is perhaps the earliest specimen of Anglo Saxon verse, the opening lines of Cædmon's Scripture paraphrase, as they are quoted by Bede We mark the initial letter of the alliterative words In the annexed translation, other objects are sacrificed in order to represent the alliteration

§ 26. Works of Poetry and Prose. Among the longer Anglo Saxon poems, the most remarkable is the epic called Beowulf, from the name of its Danish hero It is preserved in a manuscript of the tenth century, but is certainly much more ancient in its origin In substance, it must have come down from heathen times, though the form in which we have it shows the work of Christian hands We have also a long series of Scripture narratives in Anglo Saxon verse these, too, are found in a manuscript of the tenth century, but they have been generally regarded as productions of Cædmôn, a monk who lived in the last half of the seventh A manuscript of the eighth century contains the last two thirds of a metrical version of the Psalms, which may perhaps be the work of Aldhelm of Malmesbury, a contemporary of Cædmon Of shorter poems, the most interesting are the Traveler's Song, the Death of Byrhtnoth, Athelstan's Victory at Brunanburh, the very peculiar and artificial Rhyming Song, and a collection of metrical enigmas most of these poems are preserved in the famous Exeter manuscript of the eleventh century In prose, besides versions of different parts of the Bible, the most important works are the translations made from the Latin by King Alfred in the ninth century (including the History of Orosius, the Ecclesiastical History of Bede, and Boethius on the Consolations of Philosophy), the Homilies of Alfric, who was Archbishop of Canterbury in the earlier part of the eleventh century, and the Saxon Chronicle, in which the principal events of Anglo Saxon times are recorded in the form of dry and meagre annals, apparently by several successive writers, the last of whom wrote about a century after the Norman conquest

§ 27 The Celtic The Saxons and Angles, when they entered Britain, were brought into contact with a Celtic-speaking population It is true that the Latin had been spoken by the dominant people in England during more than three centuries of Roman occupation But it seems not to have established itself, as it did in Gaul and Spain so as to supplant the native language of the country It had rather the position which was afterward held on the same ground by its own child, the French, for more than two centuries after the Norman conquest It was spoken by the ruling caste, while the mass of the people adhered to their own mother tongue though they naturally received into it, as time passed on, a considerable number of words learned from their rulers In Wales, which has retained the same population from Roman times the vernacular idiom is not of Latin origin, nor is it very largely intermixed with Latin words It is true and genuine Celtic The probability is, that the great body of those whose possessions passed into Anglo Saxon hands spoke substantially the same language This being so it would not have seemed strange that the idiom of the conquered people had acted on that of the conquerors, so as to introduce a large Celtic element into Anglo-Saxon and English But the fact is quite the contrary The Celtic words in English are altogether few in number most of them — as bard, druid, crowd (a fiddle), etc — belong to objects which are specially Celtic and a large part — including nearly all those of Gaelic origin, as brogue, clan, shanty, whiskey, etc — are of recent introduction It should seem that in the slow and gradual progress of the Saxon conquests the native British fell back from point to point before the invaders or, if a part remained in their old homes, they were too few to maintain their old language and had to exchange it for the Saxon while the independent Britons and the Saxons, engaged in constant hostilities, were cut off from that free and peaceful intercourse which might have left a marked impress on the languages of both There have been, indeed, etymologists who regarded a large number of English words as borrowed from the primitive British But in many of the cases brought forward, there is no real connection between the words compared Thus A-S cûth, known (seen in Eng uncouth), has nothing to do with Welsh gwyda, knowledge gwidd stands, by Welsh euphony for earlier guid which corresponds to Lat vid-eo, Eng wit (as verb, to know) while cûth is identical with Goth kunds, and comes from the root seen in our ken and know In many other cases, there is a real connection, but no borrowing the words having come down both in the Teutonic and the Celtic from the common Indo-European stock Thus barrow, which has been identified with W barn, is really derived from the root of the verb to bear, Goth bairan, Lat fero while barn, if not taken from the English, was formed on Celtic ground from the same root, as seen in Ir bairim For in many cases when borrowing has occurred it has only been in the opposite direction, by the Celtic from the English or from the French or the Latin Thus the English solder and locker do not come from the Welsh sawduriaw and llogell, but have other satisfactory etymologies while sawdu riaw is plainly taken from the English and llogell (a locker) is simply the Latin loculus There remain, however, a small number of words — such as basket, glen, lad, dun (color), etc — in which an early borrowing from the Welsh is either certain or probable But the words tram, cabin, pier, quay, and a few others like them, if they are really of Celtic origin, have not come to us directly from the Celtic but have passed from a Celtic source into the Romance languages, and from thence into the English

§ 28 The Latin The introduction of Christianity among the Anglo Saxons at the opening of the seventh century, brought with it the study of the Latin The cultivation of learning and letters belonged almost exclusively to ecclesiastics, with whom Latin was the professional language Hence quite a number of Latin or Latinized Greek words, most of them words connected with church or religion, passed into the Anglo Saxon, thus —

Lat.	diabolus	A-S. deófol	Eng. devil
	presbyter	preóst	priest
	episcopus	biscop	bishop
	monasterium	mynster	minster
	clericus	cleric	clerk
	prædicare	predician	preach
Gr.	κυριακή, or κυριακόν	cyrice	church (kirk, Scotch)
	ελεημοσυνη	almesse	alms
Lat.	pondo	pund	pound
	moneta	mynet	mint

and several others. The names of months were also borrowed from the Latin It is worthy of notice that, while munster and mint have come to us through the Anglo Saxon, we have the same Latin words by more recent importation in the forms monastery and money, which come through the French monastère and monnaie

§ 29 The Scandinavian In the year 827, Egbert, king of the West Saxons, became the acknowledged lord of all the separate fractions into which Anglo-Saxon England had before been divided But the united kingdom was destined to suffer severely from a cause which had begun its work with the opening of that century Piratical rovers from the regions about the Baltic were at this period the scourge and terror of Europe These Scandinavians — or Danes, as the Saxons named them all, whether coming from Denmark or not — infested the whole eastern coast of England, not only making occasional descents, but conquering large districts, and forming permanent settlements Alfred the Great, though he succeeded in checking their progress and in forcing them to acknowledge his authority, allowed them to remain under their own laws in this part of England, which was thence called Danelagh (Dane law) Under his weak successors, the Danes resumed their conquering progress, and at last became masters of the whole country The Danish kings, Sweyn, Canute, and Hardicanute, held the English throne from 1013 to 1042 Yet the Danes do not appear to have settled in large numbers, except in the eastern part of the island A trace of their existence here is still seen in Ashby, Rugby, Whitby, and many other names of places with the same ending, for -by is the Icelandic by-r, Swedish by, Danish bye, a town, village There is no evidence that the Danes of England sought to perpetuate or to extend the use of their own language Even under Danish kings, the Anglo Saxon continued to be used in public acts and laws The truth appears to be, that in England, as well as in Normandy, the Scandinavian settlers did not long retain their mother-tongue, but gave it up for the more cultivated idiom of the people among whom they settled At the same time they did not fail to communicate some of their own words to the new speech of their adoption The extent of the influence thus exerted by the Danes upon our language, is very difficult to determine Anglish words which are found in the Scandinavian idioms, and are not found in the earlier Anglo-Saxon or other Low Germanic idioms, we may naturally suspect to have come in by this channel But the inquiry is subject to great uncertainties The existing monuments of the early Anglo-Saxon are evidently far from showing its complete stock of words, and the other old monuments of Low Germanic idioms are by no means copious enough to supply the deficiency It is certain, however, that the Danish influence has been greatly overrated by those who have ascribed to it any considerable fraction of the English vocabulary To this influence we may trace the plural are of the verb to be, Icelandic erum, we are, eruth, ye are, eru, they are, for which the Anglo-Saxon always uses sindon or synd, and the adjective same, for though the Anglo-Saxon has the word as an adverb, it always uses gelc for the adjective (compare Scotch of that ilk, i. e., of the same of a place bearing the same name)

§ 30. The Norman-French The Normans (or North men) were a body of Scandinavian adventurers, who, while their countrymen, the Danes, were making conquests in England, succeeded in establishing themselves on the opposite coast of France In 912, King Charles the Simple ceded to Duke Rollo and his Norman followers the province which took from them its name of Normandy Here they soon ceased to speak their own language, adopting that which was spoken by the native population If in this they took the same course with their Danish kinsmen in England, the change was a much greater one in the case of the Normans, for the Scandinavian differed far less from the Anglo Saxon, another member of the same Teutonic family, than from the French, which was a daughter of the Latin The influence of the Norman French began to be felt in England even before the Norman conquest of the country It seems to have been much used at the court of Edward the Confessor, who followed the Danish dynasty, and reigned from 1042 to 1066 This prince, though of Saxon birth, had spent his youth in Normandy When he became king of England, he surrounded himself with Normans, exciting thus the jealousy of his native subjects, who in 1052 constrained him to banish the obnoxious foreigners After his death, Duke William of Normandy had claim to the English crown, and the hard-fought battle of Hastings, in 1066, in which Harold, the Saxon king, was slain, and his army totally defeated, established the claim of the Conqueror This event, which has affected the whole subsequent history of England, has had the most important influence on its language. It was not, indeed, the intention of William to suppress the language of his new subjects He is said to have made an attempt, though an unsuccessful one, to acquire it himself But the political and social conditions which followed the conquest were extremely unfavorable to the language of the conquered people. Their obstinate resistance and repeated insurrections led the Conqueror to treat them with the utmost severity They were shut out from offices of state, they were removed from ecclesiastical positions, they were deprived of lands and reduced to poverty and wretchedness. The court, the nobility, the landed gentry, the clergy, the army, were all Norman. The Anglo-Saxon language was banished from these circles, and the French took its place. The instruction of the schools was given in French alone. There was nothing to stimulate, there was every thing to discourage, the cultivation of the native language.

TRANSITION FROM ANGLO-SAXON TO MODERN ENGLISH.

§ 31 Periods. For five centuries after the Norman conquest, the language of England was in a constant and rapid process of change. During the first of these centuries, we may believe that it had not yet departed very widely from the earlier type The last monument of the old language is the concluding part of the Saxon Chronicle, in which the history is brought down to the death of King Stephen in 1154 We can not, however, suppose that the writer of that part has used the idiom which was spoken by the people in his own time The change by which, in grammatical endings, the older vowels a, o, u, have all passed into e, as found in High German from the beginning of the twelfth century it probably took place even earlier in our language In the second century after the conquest, the old inflection, with the change just described, is still for the most part retained, but in a state of much confusion and corruption this is called the Semi Saxon period In the third century, a large part of the old inflection has disappeared, while no great proportion of French words has yet come into the language this is called the Old English period In the fourth and fifth centuries, we find a vast body of French words mixed with those of native stock, while the old inflection is brought down to that minimum which remains in the language at this day this is called the Middle English period It must be remembered that the process of change was gradual and incessant the language did not remain fixed for a time, and then on a sudden leap to a new position Hence the periods here distinguished are in some degree arbitrary, at least as regards their boundaries, and writers may be found of the same period who are separated from each other by marked differences of language.

§ 32 Changes It is implied in the foregoing statements that the changes in our language, consequent on the Norman occupation of England, were mainly of two kinds 1 The loss of the Anglo Saxon inflection, and, 2 The introduction of new words from the French The latter change did not go on to any great extent until more than two centuries after the conquest, yet no one can doubt that it was caused by that event But in regard to the earlier change, — the loss of the ancient inflection, — it is maintained by some writers that this was in no degree occasioned by the coming of the Normans A similar change in the modern languages of Latin origin is often explained from the difficulty which the barbarian conquerors of the Roman empire must have found in mastering the complex system of Latin inflection The explanation, whether satisfactory or not for the Romance languages, can not be applied to ours, for the change in question had nearly run its course before any large part of the Normans had begun to speak English It is true also that changes of the same nature have been made, and not very far from the same time, in the other Germanic idioms in each of them, the one vowel e has taken the place of other vowels in grammatical endings, and in each, a part of the endings have been confounded with one another, or have disappeared altogether What is peculiar to the English is the rapidity of this movement and the extent to which it was carried No written language of Germanic stock, no unwritten dialect of any province or people, shows, even at the present day, a loss of inflection equal to what appears in the English of five hundred years ago This striking peculiarity in the effect compels us to seek for a peculiar cause, and no cause can be found so likely to produce it, as the long subjection of the English speaking people to a people of different race and language The tendencies and influences which would in any case have given a new form to the English, as they have to its sister idioms, derived additional force and greater quickness of operation from the depressed circumstances of the English people The language shared in the suffering and degradation which fell on those who spoke it Used only by the lower classes, and regarded with contempt by the higher, shut out from the schools, from cultivated society, and, with few exceptions, from works of literature, it was left without standards of correctness, it was deprived of those conservative influences which might otherwise have retarded the progress of change and disintegration

§ 33. Semi-Saxon Period, 1150-1250. The Anglo-Saxon inflection is still in a great measure retained, but with e instead of other vowels in the endings, and with much confusion and irregularity of use This period is represented chiefly by three works 1 The Brut of Layamon, a long, narrative poem, which recites the early fabulous history of Britain It is a free translation, or, more truly, a working over, of the Roman de Brut, composed in French by Wace, and finished in 1155 Layamon was a priest, who lived at Ernley, in Northworcestershire, near the close of the twelfth century His work consists of 32,250 short lines, partly alliterative, like the Anglo Saxon verse, partly rhymed, like the French original, both kinds being very loosely constructed and irregularly mixed together A second manuscript of the poem affords an instructive example of the way in which older writings were wont to be modernized in successive transcriptions, it is, perhaps, half a century later than the first, and shows a text which is much altered, and decidedly more modern. 2. The Ormulum, as it is called by its author, an Augustinian monk, from his own name, Ormin, or Orm The poem — or what remains of it — contains nearly 20,000 short lines, and consists of thirty-two parts, founded on successive gospel selections in the daily church service, the narrative being first set forth in a loose paraphrase, and then followed by homiletic comments The verses are arranged in couplets, with a line of eight syllables followed by one of seven, they are con structed with much regularity of accent, though without either alliteration or rhyme. As regards its language, the poem is evidently more modern than that of Layamon Its appearance, however, is rendered uncouth by a peculiarity of spelling, which is not without interest and value to the philologist · it carries out consistently the tendency of English orthography to double the consonant which follows a short vowel thus, and, this, after, under, are spelt annd, thiss, affterr, unnderr 3. The Ancren Riwle, or rule of female anchorites, a prose work by an unknown author, containing a code of monastic regulations for a household of religious ladies. Owing, perhaps, to the nature of its subject, it shows quite a number of words borrowed from the French and Latin, while in the works before named such words are altogether rare.

§ 34. Old English Period, 1250-1350. Here the Anglo Saxon inflection is to a great extent discarded, but only a moderate proportion of words is yet adopted from the French The principal monuments are, 1 A proclamation of King Henry III , issued in 1258, a short but highly important document 2 A series of metrical romances, entitled Kyng Alisaunder, The Owl and Nightingale, The Geste of Kyng Horn, Havelok the Dane, and others, which belong to the latter part of the thirteenth century They are composed in rhymed verses, and are most of them founded on French originals 3 The long rhymed chronicle by Robert of Gloucester, who flourished about 1300, and the still longer one by Robert Manning, or Robert de Brunne, who wrote some years later Both these writers traverse the whole field of English history, mythical and veritable, from Brut and his Trojans down to Henry III. and Edward I There is also a collection of lives and legends of the saints, which is ascribed to Robert of Gloucester.

§ 35. Introduction of French Words. In a vocabulary of the words used by English writers during the last half of the thirteenth century, only about twelve per cent of the whole number are foreign to the Anglo Saxon If we take the words of any writer as they stand in his pages, the proportion will be much smaller For Robert of Gloucester, it does not exceed four or five per cent But from the middle of the fourteenth century, English literature presents in this respect a different appearance A multitude of Romance words is every where seen, mixed with those of Teutonic origin Even works which, like the Vision of Piers Ploughman, were intended for the people, abound in words taken from the French The difference between the English of 1400 and that of 1350 marks this as the time when the higher classes in England became generally acquainted with the English language Up to this time the inhabitants of the country had been divided into two bodies, having each a language of its own The nobility and gentry of Norman origin retained their French, and only in occasional instances acquired the Saxon, which they looked on with contempt, as rude in itself and spoken by an inferior race They had a copious literature, consisting chiefly of poetry and romance, composed in French, but written, much of it, on English soil On the other hand, the mass of the people spoke only English Of course there must have been many individuals who knew both languages, and could act as necessary mediators between the great parties that knew but one These, however, formed only a small fraction of the whole people In those times, a work composed in English could not admit French words to any great extent, for such a work would not be read by the higher classes, and to the lower classes French was generally unintelligible But the events of the thirteenth century had been gradually filling up the chasm which before separated the two races When the French possessions of the English crown were wrested from the feeble hands of John, the political ties were severed which had long connected the Normans of England with their brethren across the Channel Henceforth England, not France, was their country the English people, not the French, were their countrymen They fought with Saxon fellow-soldiers against French enemies they struggled against royal prerogative with sympathy and aid from Saxon fellow subjects At the same time, social barriers were giving way Marriage ties were connecting the two races Saxons were acquiring wealth, passing into the ranks of the aristocracy, or rising to high positions in the church The feeling of a common nationality was coming to prevail over the alienating memories of race and conquest Under such influences, it was natural that the French-speaking aristocracy should begin to learn English. They did this as a matter of convenience, to carry on the necessary intercourse of business and society, without designing to give up the French, which in many instances continued to be spoken in their families for two or three generations longer The change, we may presume, commenced with that lower, but more numerous part of the Norman aristocracy, who resided constantly on their estates, surrounded by a Saxon population Once fairly initiated, the movement must have gone forward with rapidity The court was the last place to be reached by its influence It is believed that none of the three Edwards was accustomed to speak English In the schools, it is stated that, during the first half of the fourteenth century, French was still used as the language of instruction and the medium for learning Latin, but that during the last half of the same century the English gradually took its place Now, English, as spoken by the higher classes who learned it, would naturally be intermixed with French expressions. It would have been otherwise, if they had regarded the English as a superior language, as having a finer nature or a higher cultivation than their own But they doubtless felt that by an intermixture of French they were enriching and ennobling an unrefined and meagre idiom Whenever the French word which rose to their mind bore a shade of meaning for which they found no equivalent in English, they did not content themselves with a loose expression, nor did they endeavor to form by English analogy one that should be exact. they employed the French word itself They did this even when the English offered an equivalent expression, if the French word was particularly recommended by interesting or agreeable associations. For words of a technical character they would scarcely think of seeking equivalents in English. The body of the English people were now for the first time brought into oral communication with their rulers Hearing the French words with the Saxon, they were able to understand their meanings. Hearing them from the lips of their superiors, they naturally imitated and adopted them Thus the new importations, bearing the stamp of elegance and fashion, passed from the circles of polite society into the language of the vulgar. They found free entrance into works of literature, not only because they supplied real deficiencies in the English vocabulary, but also because they were especially familiar and acceptable to those classes whom the author would most wish to interest and please.

§ 36 Middle English Period, 1350-1550 The old inflection undergoes some further losses, the unaccented final e (as in love, fame, etc) begins to disappear in pronunciation, but the great characteristic of this period is the immense accession of words taken from the French. It will be enough to name here a few of the most important works and authors In the poems of Laurence Minot, written about 1350, we find for the first time a large proportion of French words These were followed (between 1360 and 1370) by the popular poem entitled The Vision of Piers Ploughman, a satirical allegory ascribed to Robert Langlande It is written in alliterative verse of very regular construction The same species of verse is found in some poems of a similar character which followed the Vision, but it was not used by Chaucer and Gower in the same age, nor has it been used by any poet since the end of that century The great name of early English literature is Geoffrey Chaucer, who died in 1400, and the Canterbury Tales is the most perfect, as it is probably the latest, of his productions The charge often brought against him, of having corrupted the simplicity of the native popular English by large importation of French words, only shows a want of acquaintance with the literature of that time His contemporary John Gower, whose chief English work is the Confessio Amantis, though far inferior in genius to Chaucer, was for a long time held in equal or even greater, estimation To the first half of the fifteenth century belongs John Lydgate, a copious writer and fluent versifier, but of little poetic talent Among the prose writings of this period, the earliest is the Travels of Sir John Mandeville, composed about 1356 But more important in their influence on the language were the Wycliffite Versions of the Bible The Old Testament is supposed to have been translated by Hereford, the New Testament by Wycliffe himself, the whole being finished about 1380 To Purvey is ascribed a revision of the whole work, made some eight or ten years later, with many alterations and corrections

§ 37 The century from 1450 to 1550 might be regarded as a distinct period The unaccented final e was now generally neglected, and at length wholly lost in pronunciation, and in many ways the language assumed a more modern aspect Literature received a new impulse from the art of printing. Among the most important of the numerous books which issued from the celebrated Caxton press (1470 to 1490) was the Morte d'Arthur by Sir Thomas Malory a prose compendium of the poetical legends concerning King Arthur and his knights of the Round Table The translation of Froissart's Chronicle by Lord Berners, which appeared in 1523-25, was not unworthy of the rich and glowing original We may mention also as excellent specimens of the language at that time, the writings of Sir Thomas More, and the New Testament translation of William Tyndale, which was printed in 1526 As for the poets of that most unpoetic age it is enough to name the rude but vigorous Skelton The poems of Surrey and Wyatt, though written before 1550 belong more in language and character to the following period

§ 38 Commencement of the Modern Period With the middle of the sixteenth century, the English enters on a new stage of its history It did not cease to change , for then it would have ceased to be a living language But its later changes have not had the rapid progress and the radical character which belonged to those of the preceding centuries Many words which were in use three hundred years ago, have since become obsolete A much larger number have been added to the language, including not only technical and scientific terms by the thousand, but a multitude of words which belong to the common stock of literature and society Words which have been retained have often lost their old meanings and taken on new ones In the combination and construction of words, in phrase and idiom, the changes have been yet more numerous, and the general color and flavor of English style are quite different now from what they were in the last half of the sixteenth century But these differences are mainly lexical and rhetorical, rather than grammatical As to inflection, the little which remained at that time has come down to us with hardly any change Yet the ending th in the third person singular of verbs (as cometh, doeth or doth) has all but disappeared from the common language, and remains chiefly as an archaism of the solemn or religious style, being kept in memory by the usage of the English Bible The subjunctive, as distinct from the indicative in the third person singular (as if he come, if he do it, if it be so), is also growing obsolete Still we never feel that the language of Shakspeare and Bacon is widely different from our own Even Spenser, notwithstanding the archaisms with which he loved to garnish his style, appears to us much less strange and remote than Lord Berners and Sir Thomas More The great writers of the Elizabethan age have done much to perpetuate and keep alive the form of English which is seen in their works The authorized version of the Bible has exerted a conservative influence of the same kind, and one even more powerful It must be observed, however, that this version as printed now has not in all respects its original appearance · the spelling has been modernized, and a number of obsolete forms have given place to those in present use Thus moe is changed to more, sith to since, fet to fetched, owneth to owneth, unpossi-

ble to impossible, etc. A judicious revision, with further alterations of antiquated phraseology, seems desirable at this time If works printed in Shakspeare's day appear strange, at first view, to the modern reader, it is chiefly owing to changes since made in the spelling, which did not become fixed until a century later. Unfortunately, these changes are far from having made the orthography of the language simple and consistent The defects of English spelling have to a great extent arisen from the mixture of different elements in the language Neither the Anglo-Saxon orthography nor the Norman-French was distinguished for its regularity But when the two were thrown together, the result was a mass of confusion and anomaly hardly to be paralleled, except, perhaps, in the spelling of the native Irish The present system retains much of this chaotic character It is, perhaps, too firmly fixed for extensive changes, such as could alone effect a material improvement But it is not creditable to the English name, nor accordant with the practical spirit of the English people With a multitude of signs for the same sound, and a multitude of sounds for the same sign, it poorly fulfills the original and proper office of orthography, to indicate pronunciation, nor does it better fulfill the improper office, which some would assert for it, of a guide to etymology It imposes a needless burden on the native learner To a foreigner it seriously aggravates the difficulty of acquiring the language, and thus restricts the influence of English literature on the mind of the world

§ 39. Introduction of Latin and Greek words We have already seen that a number of words passed from the Latin into the Anglo Saxon The same process has gone on in the subsequent stages of the language With the inception of the Middle English period, it received a new impulse The admission of foreign words in great numbers from the French, a daughter of the Latin, made it natural and easy to admit them also from the mother language In many instances it is difficult to determine whether a word of Latin origin has come to us through the French, or has been taken directly from the Latin But while the importation of French words ceased, after a time, to be an active and prominent agency in the growth of the language, it has been otherwise with the tendency to borrow from the Latin This became even stronger with the increasing attention to classical studies The fondness for Latin phraseology is noticed with censure by Thomas Wilson in his System of Rhetoric and of Logic, published in 1551 "The unlearned or foolish fantastical, that smells but of learning (such fellows as have seen learned men in their days), will so Latin their tongues, that the simple can not but wonder at their talk, and think surely they speak by some revelation" In like manner an author of the next century, Sir Thomas Browne, whose own style is in a large measure Latin, remarks, "If elegancy still proceedeth, and English pens maintain that stream we have of late observed to flow from many, we shall within a few years be fain to learn Latin to understand English, and a work will prove of equal facility in either" The practice of adding to the English vocabulary words adopted from the Latin and the Greek is still carried on with activity, and there is little prospect of its ceasing It is almost necessary as a means of denoting those new objects, ideas, and relations, which are continually appearing and demanding expression The resources of the English for the formation of new words from elements already existing in it are so limited that aid from other languages is indispensable The new terms which are required by the progress of science, are almost wholly drawn from these sources, especially from the inexhaustible storehouse of Greek expression.

THE ENGLISH A COMPOSITE LANGUAGE

§ 40 Proportion of the Elements There is no language, probably, in which all the words are formed by its own processes from roots that originally belonged to it What is peculiar to the English is not that it has words borrowed from other languages, but that it has so many of them, that a large part of its vocabulary is of foreign origin. In this respect it may be compared to the modern Persian and the Wallachian The French words which have been ingrafted on the native English stock are, with few exceptions, derived from the Latin, and when added to the almost equal number which have come directly from that language, they make, perhaps, four fifths of all our borrowed words Much smaller, though still considerable, especially in scientific use, is the number of words taken from the Greek The remainder of our foreign words can hardly exceed a twentieth part of the whole vocabulary, and are drawn from a great variety of sources — Celtic, Danish, Dutch, Hebrew, Arabic, Turkish, etc If all the words in a large English dictionary were classed according to their origin, it would appear that the foreign or non-Saxon words make a decided majority of the whole number It must be remarked, however, that in such a dictionary there are many words which, though perhaps put forward by distinguished writers, have never established themselves in general use, and also many words which belong, indeed, to the established phraseology of particular sciences and arts, but are unknown to the great majority even of educated people In both classes the number of foreign words is disproportionately large Hence, if we take all the distinct words used by particular writers, we shall find a different ratio between the Saxon and foreign elements. Of those used by Shakspeare, it is said that sixty per cent are of Saxon origin, and the ratio is about the same for the common version of the Bible But in most literary works of the last two centuries, the foreign element is certainly larger in general, doubtless, it would be found, if reckoned in this way, to equal or exceed the Saxon But if, instead of counting only distinct words as they would be given in a vocabulary, we count all the words of a writer as they stand on his pages, we shall obtain very different ratios. The Saxon words will now be found in a large majority, varying from sixty to more than ninety per cent. of the whole number The style of Johnson abounds in words of Latin origin, but in the Preface to his Dictionary there are seventy-two per cent. of Saxon words In Milton's poetical works about two thirds of the vocabulary are foreign, but in the sixth book of Paradise Lost, four fifths of all the words are Saxon. The explanation of these appearances lies in two facts: 1 The words which belong more to the grammar than to the lexicon — which express not so much conceptions of the mind as the relations between its conceptions — are almost wholly Saxon To this class belong articles, pronouns, adverbs from pronominal roots, nearly all prepositions and conjunctions (only save, except, during, concerning, because, and a few more, are French). These are words which occur in every sentence In a language, like ours, of scanty inflection, it is hardly possible to form two consecutive sentences without them. The substantial elements of the proposition, nouns, adjectives, verbs, may all be obtained from abroad; but the connecting links, which must unite them in the framework of sentences, can only be found at home 2 If we turn to these substantial elements, and fix upon the objects, qualities, states, and actions which most frequently present themselves to the mind, and thus call for the most frequent expression, it will be found that a large majority of them are denoted by words of Saxon origin We refer to objects, such as man, horse, bird, body, flesh, blood, head, hand, heart, soul, mind, heaven, wind, rain, day, summer, water, stone, gold, field, tree, apple, etc, to qualities, such as good, bad, high, low, long, short, cold, hot, hard, soft, white, black, etc, to actions, such as to lie, sit, stand, walk, run, do, say, take, have, break, think, feel, love, fear, find, etc There are borrowed words of similar meaning, as beast, eagle, vein, face, spirit, air, hour, autumn, river, gem, fruit, flower, etc, large, false, tender, pure, purple, etc., to rest, move, enter, touch, please, enjoy, etc, but they are altogether fewer, and generally of less frequent occurrence The words for numbers lower than a million are all Saxon among the ordinals only second has come in from the French.

§ 41. Fusion of the Elements The foreign words that have come into our language do not stand by themselves as a distinct and independent class they are Anglicized, subjected to English laws and analogies, and thus assimilated to the older denizens of the language This has taken place chiefly in three ways 1 They are in most cases accented according to English analogy. This assumption of a new accent has been a gradual process. In early English poetry we find cẽntre (country), colour, comaundément, messangere, benysoun (benison), castẽll (castle), etc, accented as in French on the vowel here marked. The usage of Chaucer is quite variable Such words as honour, difficultie, penance, vanquésh, manere (manner), peraventure, conseil (counsel), viage (voyage), etc, he often gives, as here marked, with the French accent, yet not unfrequently he shifts their accent, according to English tendencies, toward the beginning of the word In the next century the French accent is still to be seen, but with a greater prevalence of the English And the latter had established itself in Shakspeare's time nearly as at the present day A number of words which as verbs retain the French accent, when used as nouns, exchange it for an English one thus accent and to accent, concert and to concért, insult and to insult, etc 2. The borrowed words are declined according to English analogy It is true that radius, nucleus, momentum, criterion, phenomenon, and some other words, retain their Latin and Greek plurals, radii, nuclei, momenta, criteria, phenomena, etc But these are rare exceptions In general, the few inflections left in English are applied as readily to a French or Latin word as to a Saxon one As the Saxon verb love makes lovest, loves, loved, lovedst, loving, so the French verb move makes movest, moves, moved, movedst, moving 3 The borrowed words are often made to receive prefixes which come from the Saxon, as in be-siege, un-pretending, mis-conceive, under-value, over-turn, after piece, out line, etc, or formative suffixes which come from the Saxon, as in largeness, dukedom, false hood, apprentice-ship, use-less, grate ful, quarrel-some, fool-ish, etc It affords a still more striking evidence of the fusion which has taken place among the elements of our language, that the process here described is in many cases reversed, that particular endings which were found in the foreign words, have become so familiar to the English ear and mind, as to be disjoined from their connections, and applied with more or less frequency to words of native stock Thus, we find Saxon words with French prefixes, as in en-dear, dis belief, re light, inter-mingle, trans-ship, etc, and Saxon words with French formative suffixes, as in forbear-ance, bond age, atone ment, robbery, odd-ity, stream-let, hunt-ess, eat-able, burn-al, right eous, talk ative, etc.

§ 42 Different Character of the Elements. It must be admitted that the fusion of which we have spoken is not a complete one The borrowed words, taken as a class, have a peculiar character, which separates them, even to the feeling of uneducated persons, from those of native stock There are, indeed, particular cases in which the ordinary relation does not hold, there are some in which it is actually inverted, as in sign and token, color and hue, power and might Here the familiar sign, color, power, are from the French, and the more poetical token, hue, might, are from the Saxon. But in general the Saxon words are simple, homely, and substantial, fitted for every-day events and natural feelings, while the French and Latin words are elegant, dignified, and artificial, fitted for the pomp of rhetoric, the subtlety of disputation, or the courtly reserve of diplomacy The difference arises partly from the fact already noticed, that the most familiar objects, qualities, and actions have generally retained their primitive Saxon designations. The foreign words bear an impress derived from the courtiers and scholars who introduced them To a great extent they stand for conceptions which belong especially to disciplined thought and cultivated feeling But the difference, no doubt, depends also on the impression which the two classes of words make upon the ear. The Saxon are shorter, in great part monosyllabic, and often full of consonants, while the French and Latin words are longer, smoother, and have greater breadth of vowel-sounds. It can not well be denied that this marked diversity of character between native and foreign words gives to our language a somewhat heterogeneous and incongruous aspect. Yet it furnishes means for great variety in the expression of the same thoughts, and serves to distinguish and individualize the styles of different authors. Among writers who in this respect occupy an extreme position, may be named, on the one side, Bunyan, De Foe, Franklin, and Cobbett, on the other, Hooker, Milton, Johnson, and Chalmers

§ 43. It has been observed that in the Liturgy of the church of England there is a marked tendency to couple French and Saxon expressions of the same, or nearly the same, meaning, as if in this way to address the taste and understanding of all classes thus, "to acknowledge and confess," "by his infinite goodness and mercy;" "when we assemble and meet together" A similar tendency has been pointed out elsewhere, as in the writings of Hooker

§ 44. It was natural that when a multitude of foreign words were brought into our language, many should coincide in meaning with words that already belonged to it In some cases, as in will and testament, yearly and annual, begin and commence, etc, the two words have continued to be used with scarcely any difference of meaning But the tendency has been to turn the new material to good account by giving to the words of each pair senses more or less clearly distinguished from each other In body and corpse, love and amour, work and travel, sheep and mutton, etc, the distinction is a broad one in bloom and flower, luck and fortune, mild and gentle, win and gain, etc, it is slighter and more subtile The discrimmations thus established have added much to the resources of the language, giving it a peculiar richness and delicacy of expression.

THE ENGLISH POOR IN FORMATION AND INFLECTION.

§ 45 Power of Self-development lost. The English has lost a large part of the formative endings which belonged to the Anglo Saxon. Many which still appear in English are confined to the particular words that now have them, and can no longer be used in the formation of new words Only a very few (as er, ing, -ness, for substantives, -y, -ish, for adjectives, -en for verbs, -ly for adverbs) continue to be used with much freedom for this purpose. So, too, many prepositions and particles which were once freely employed as prefixes in the formation of compound verbs, are no longer used in this way From the simple verb to stand the English makes understand and withstand the Anglo-Saxon had ðtstandan, bestandan, bigstandan, forstandan, forestandan, gestandan, ðdhstandan, understandan, withstandan, ymbstandan This deficiency in English is made up in a measure by the use of separate particles, as, to stand up, to stand off, to stand by, to stand to, etc Still the formative system of the language has become greatly restricted It no longer possesses the unlimited power of development from its own resources which we see in the Anglo Saxon and in the modern German If a new word is wanted, instead of producing it from elements already existing in English, we must often go to the Latin or the Greek, and find or fashion there something that will answer the purpose By this process our language is placed in a dependent position, being reduced to supply its needs by constant borrowing But it is a more serious disadvantage that in order to express our ideas we are obliged to translate them into dead languages The expressiveness of the new term, that which fits it for its purpose, is hidden from those who are unacquainted with the classic tongues, that is, in many cases, from the great body of those who are to use it To them it is a group of arbitrary syllables, and nothing more The term thus loses its suggestiveness, and the language suffers greatly in its power of quickening and aiding thought

§ 46. Freedom of Position restricted It is one disadvantage arising from the loss of inflection that our language is much restricted in the position and arrangement of words The result is unfortunate, not only as it tends to monotonous uniformity of expression, but still more as it takes away the best means of representing emphasis, or the superior importance of a particular word in the sentence The simple Latin sentence, "dux regem decepit," may be arranged in six different orders without doing violence to Latin idiom the choice of one order rather than another, if partly regulated by euphony or by love of variety, is also much influenced by the relative importance of the terms But the corresponding English sentence has its fixed, invariable order, "the general deceived the king" transposition would give it a wholly different meaning It is true that we are able by a change from active to passive, as well as by other devices, to secure variety of expression, and to satisfy the demands of emphasis thus "the king was deceived by the general," "it was the general who deceived the king," "it was the king who was deceived by the general," "a deception was practised by the general on the king," etc Still, with all such helps, we are often obliged to indicate by the clumsy device of Italic letters what a more highly inflected language could have shown in the position of the words It should be said, however, in justice to the English, that it uses nearly all the freedom of arrangement, which, scantily inflected as it is, would be consistent with perspicuity It is therefore superior in actual variety of arrangement to the French, and perhaps not inferior to the more highly inflected German, which in the ordinary prose style has limited its natural freedom by inconvenient and cumbrous restrictions

§ 47. Monosyllabism and Want of Euphony. The loss of inflection has reduced a multitude of English words to the form of monosyllables. It is not uncommon to find whole sentences which contain no word of greater length This peculiarity helps us to understand, better than most other nations are able to do, that primitive monosyllabic condition which must have preceded all inflected language — a condition which has remained unchanged to this day in languages like the Chinese, where every syllable is a separate word, with its own accent and its own distinctly apprehended meaning. If this monosyllabic character gives a certain plain directness and pithy force to English expression, it can hardly be doubted that it is a disadvantage to euphony and rhythm Pope complains that "ten low words oft creep in one dull line" And no one can read Chaucer's poetry, pronouncing the unaccented e as the verse requires, and as it was actually pronounced in the poet's time, without regretting that a hurried and slurring pronunciation of our fathers should have destroyed this pleasing feature of the old language The suppression of this e has also been unfavorable to euphony by producing, in a multitude of cases, the harshest combinations of consonants, as in hosts, breadths, texts, shifts, thirsts, bulg(e)d, starch(e)d, task(e)d In these words, which can not be properly pronounced without a strong effort of will and of vocal organs, the earlier dissyllabic forms, host es, breadth es, starch ed, task-ed, etc, presented little or no difficulty of utterance In most of these cases, as in many others, the harshness has been aggravated by that extended use of the final s, which has given a peculiar sibilating character to the pronunciation of our language In Anglo Saxon, only a part of the nouns took s in the plural, and those only in two out of the four cases in English, the s has been applied to nearly all plural nouns, and for all cases of the plural In Anglo Saxon, the verb in the third person singular of the present has th, never s in the English of our day, this th is still occasionally employed as an archaic form, but in all ordinary use s has taken its place.

DIALECTS

§ 48 The English language is not spoken with uniformity by all who use it. Nearly every county in Britain has its local dialect, its peculiar words and forms, which are used by the common people of the lower classes This diversity is, in part, of long standing, in some points, doubtless, it goes back even to Anglo Saxon times The great variety of local idioms is said to divide itself naturally into two main classes, the one belonging to the east and north of the island, the other to the west and south For most of the dialects, glossaries have been published, often with specimen-compositions of greater or less extent, but only the Scotch can be said to have a literature Scottish literature, which is almost wholly poetical, begins in the fourteenth century, with John Barbour, a contemporary of Chaucer His long historical poem, entitled The Bruce, was followed in the early part of the next century by the Originale Chronykil of Andrew of Wyntoun, and in its latter part by the Wallace of Henry the Minstrel, often called Blind Harry But the king's Quair, by the unfortunate James I of Scotland, is not written in the Scottish dialect In the sixteenth century we find, first, Gawin Douglas, the translator of the Æneid and author of the Palace of Honour, and then two poets of higher genius, William Dunbar and Sir David Lyndsay In more recent times, the most eminent writers of this dialect are Allan Ramsay, the author of the Gentle Shepherd, and, greatest of all, Robert Burns

§ 49 In every dialect, apparently, there are preserved a certain number of old words and forms, which have passed out of use, or have suffered alteration in the common language, but it is equally true that every dialect has lost or altered some which remain unchanged in the common language Thus, if the Scotch kye for cows, brak for broke, etc, are closer to the Anglo-Saxon than are the corresponding English words, the contrary is true of gae for gave, ja' for full, hood for hold, wunna for will not, etc It is believed that, on the whole, the common English stands nearer than any of the dialects to the early form of the language

§ 50 The English is spoken by the common people of Ireland, has many peculiarities, both of sound and of idiom, borrowed from the Gaelic, which was once the language of the whole island

§ 51 In America, settlers from different parts of the mother country were brought together in the same colonies, so that no dialect of England or Scotland has been preserved in its distinctness on the new continent At the same time, the migratory habits of the people have had the effect of securing a general uniformity of language in all parts of the country With the exception of the negro dialect in the Southern States, it can hardly be said that there are local dialects in America The forms of speech which are noticed as Americanisms, are not, in general, confined to a particular state or district Under this name are included expressions which are widely different in their character. Some are confined wholly to uncultivated people, others to those who are not only uncultivated, but vulgar, while a large part are constantly, and indeed necessarily, used by persons of the highest education They also differ widely in their origin Some are derived from the native Indian languages, as wigwam, squaw, hominy, etc, some from the French, as levee, creasse, bayou, etc, some from the Spanish, as rancho, canyon, stampede, etc, yet more from the Dutch, as patroon, boss (master workman), stoop (porch), cooky (small cake), etc. Most of the foregoing words relate to things that are specially American to express other objects or relations of this kind, new formations have been made from English words, as congressional, federalist, mileage, nullification, etc, or English words have been used in new meanings, as eagle (coin), corduroy road, to locate land, etc. There are other cases of new formation, which have no such reason, as outsider, talented, to eventuate, etc, or of new senses for old words, as to fix (put in order), to guess (think, believe), creek (small river), etc. Some words which once belonged to the common language, but have become obsolete in England, are still heard in America, as fall (autumn), gully (channel worn by water), peek (peep), rare (underdone), etc A larger number of Americanisms have come from the English dialects, as basl (handle of pail), shack (worthless fellow), spry (nimble), to lam (beat), to stump (break through snow or bog), etc. And beside these, there are words and uses of words which are mere vulgarisms, the language of cant or slang, as to absquatulate (abscond), splurge (pompous display), to fork over or shell out money, etc. A number of words will always be wanted to express what is peculiar to America in nature, society, and institutions But apart from these, it is not probable that Americanisms will ever be multiplied to any great extent. For, besides the active and increasing intercourse with the other side of the Atlantic, the almost universal habit of reading, which finds exercise both in English and American authors, will have a powerful tendency to keep the language, even of the poorer classes, in substantial agreement with the common language of literature.

The following brief sketch of Anglo Saxon inflection is founded on Moritz Heyne's Kurze Laut und Flexionslehre der altgermanischen Sprachstämme, Paderborn, 1862 The outlines of early English inflection are founded on Eduard Fiedler's Wissenschaftliche Grammatik der englischen Sprache, Leipzig, 1861, with much help from Prof. F J Child's Observations on the Language of Chaucer (in Memoirs of the American Academy, New Series, Vol. VIII.)

ANGLO-SAXON INFLECTION.

§ 52. The Anglo-Saxon had seven long vowels, â, ê, î, ô, û, æ, ŷ The first five appear to have been sounded as in Eng par, prey, caprice, prone, prune æ was probably sounded much like Eng a in fair The sound of ŷ apparently, like that of French u and German ü, was intermediate between ê and î To these correspond seven short vowels, a, e, i, o, u, ă, y, which were less prolonged in utterance The short i and y are often confounded in writing, as hyrde, shepherd, cining, king, but more correctly hirde, cyning So, too, though less often, the short e and ă, as deg, day, ăft, again, more correctly dăg, eft

§ 53. The combinations ea and eo are often used for original short vowels, ea for a, eo for i, as beald for bald, bold, seolfor for silfor, silver When they have the character of genuine diphthongs, they are written ea, eo, which stand for primitive Teutonic au, iu, respectively

§ 54 The two sounds of the English th are represented in Anglo-Saxon by distinct letters, þ for the whispered sound in Eng thin, breath, ð for the vocal sound in Eng thus, breathe By a general rule — which some editors make invariable — þ is used when the aspirate begins a word, ð when it has any other position In giving Anglo-Saxon words, we shall write th for þ and dh for ð

§ 55 The Anglo-Saxon never uses y as a consonant, but, apparently, ge, and even g alone, were sometimes used to express that sound, as in geoc, yoke, git, you two The letter h before a consonant, or at the end of a word, must have had a stronger sound than in English, and w in the same position must have approached somewhat toward the sound of English r

§ 56 It is a general rule that a consonant can not be doubled either at the end of a word or before or after another consonant, as swam (for swamm), he swam, swimdh (for swimmdh), he swims, sende (for sendde), he sent, ehte (for ehtte), he persecuted

§ 60 Words of more than one syllable which end in el, en, er, or, are often syncopated before a case-ending, as caldor, masc., elder, gen. caldres, tâcen, neut., token, plur. tâcnu; so, also, some others, as heafod, neut., head, plur. heafdu.

§ 61. Masculines and neuters of one syllable which have the vowel ă, take a instead of ă in the plural, as dăg, masc., day, plur. dagas; făt, neut., vessel, plur fatu.

§ 62. Masculines sometimes have ena or ana, instead of a, in the gen. plur. A few masculines — as leode, men, Dene, Danes — have e in the nom acc. plur. The masculines fôt, foot, tôdh, tooth, man (gen. mannes), man, and the feminines (nom and acc) bôc, book, brôc, breeches, gôs, goose, cû, cow, lûs, louse, mûs, mouse, burh (gen burge, also byrg, byrig), town, fort, turf, turf, make in the dat sing and nom acc plur fêt, têdh, men, bêc, brêc, gês, oj, lŷs, mŷs, byrg, tyrf. Sunu, son, nom acc sing, makes suna in the gen. dat. sing and nom. gen acc. plur, sunum, dat. plur Wudu, masc., wood, is declined in the same way, but also with gen sing wudes, nom acc plur. wudas. The dat sing in a is seen also in masc winter, winter, sumer, summer, feld, field, ford, ford, and fem hand, hand, duru, door

§ 63 Neuters of one syllable which have a long vowel or end in two consonants, drop u in the nom acc. plur, as leaf, leaf and leaves, pund, pound and pounds. In the same cases, the neuters âg, egg, cealf, calf, cild, child, lamb, lamb, make âgru, cealfru, cildru, lambru, with inserted r.

§ 65 Of consonant-stems ending in other letters than n, the language has only traces Thus substantives in nd from present participles are declined like fisc, but some of them make the nom acc plur like the nom. sing, so helmberend, helm-bearer and helm-bearers, but wealdend, ruler, wealdendas, rulers Freond, friend, and feond, foe, make nom acc plur. freond, feónd, or frŷnd, fŷnd, or freondas, feondas

§ 66 Fäder, father, is indeclinable in the sing (gen sing. rarely fäderes). Acc	blindne	blinde	blind	blinde
Ins	blinde	blindre	blinde	blindum

§ 69. The instrumental case is like the dative, except in the sing masc. and neut. In the plural, the three genders are alike, except that the neuter has u, instead of e, in the nom and acc thus, masc fem blinde, neut. blindu Adjectives of one syllable, unless they have a long vowel or end in two consonants, add u in the nom sing. fem, as smalu, from small, small so, also, many adjectives of more than one syllable, which, however, sometimes take e, instead of u, in this place

§ 70. The following peculiarities extend also to the definite declension. Adjectives of one syllable, which end in a single consonant preceded by ă, take a, instead of ă, when a vowel follows in the inflection; as, smăll, small, smălne, smălra, but smalu, smales, smalum, etc., and def. smala, smalan, etc. Adjectives of more than one syllable which end in el, en, er, ig, are often syncopated when a vowel follows in the inflection; as, fĭlger, fair, fĭlgerne, fĭlgerra, but fĭlgru, fĭlgres, fĭlgrum, def. fĭlgra, fĭlgran. Adjectives of more than one syllable which end in e, lose this e before all endings, as, blīdhe, blithe, blīdh-es, blīdhre, blīdhum, blīdhne, def. blīdha, blīdhan This last remark applies to all present participles.

§ 71. Adverbs are formed from adjectives by adding e, as, swīdhe, strongly, very, from swīdh, strong, hradhe, soon, from hrădh, quick. Adverbs in lice (Eng ly) were first made by adding e to compound adjectives in lic, as, healice, highly, from healic, a compound of heăh, high, and lic (gelic), like but the adverb is often found where there is no adjective in lic, as sōdhlice, truly, from sōdh, sooth, true.

§ 72. Definite Declension. When the substantive to which the adjective belongs is definite, — as when it is connected with the definite article, or with a demonstrative or possessive pronoun, or with a genitive case, and when it stands in the vocative, — the adjective is inflected according to the N-declension.

§ 73. Comparative and Superlative. The comparative takes r, and follows the definite declension, as, leofra, dearer, from leōf, dear The superlative takes ost (or est), and is declined both definitely and indefinitely, as, leofost (or leofest), dearest. Some adjectives suffer a change of vowel, in which case the superlative can not have ost: lang, long, strang, strong, take e, as, lengra, strengest: cald, old, geong, young, feor (adv.), far, take y, as, yldra, fyrrest heăh, high, nēăh, nigh, make hỹrra, hỹhst (hēhst), nearra, nỹhst (nēhst) Several superlatives, most of them from adverbs, take mest, as, formest or fyrmest, foremost, æftermest, aftermost, lăttemest, last, sidhemest, latest, nidhemest, lowermost, ufemest (ufemest), uppermost, ūtemest (ūtemest), outmost, innemest, inmost, midmest, midmost, hindemest, hindmost these are really superlatives from forms in ma with the definite declension, as, forma, nidhema, innema, etc., in which ma is a superlative ending. Yet more irregular are

yfel, evil	wyrsa	wyrst
lytel, little	lǽssa	læst
mycel, much	mara	mæst

§ 74. Comparative and superlative adverbs are regularly formed from adjectives by the endings or and ost, as, hradhor, hradhost, from hrădh, quick.

§ 76. The Possessive Pronouns of the first and second persons are made by giving to the genitives of the personal pronouns the inflection of the indefinite adjective, as, nom. min, min, min, my, mine, gen. mines, minre, mines, dat minum, minre, minum, etc. User, before all endings but ne, becomes uss, which absorbs a following r: thus, gen usses, ússe, usses The possessive of the third person is simply the uninflected genitive of the personal pronoun, his, hire, his, plur hira But sin is sometimes used in the reflexive sense, his own, her own, its own, their own.

Varying forms are thissere (= thisse), thissera (= thissa), and thæs (= thās).

§ 78. Other demonstratives are swilc or swylc, such, thylic and thustlic, such, ylc, the same, with definite declension, self or sylf, the same, with definite declension self, sylf, with indefinite declension, is emphatic, as, ic self, I myself, me sylfum, to me myself

§ 79. The Interrogative Pronouns are hwa, masc and fem, who? hwæt, neut., what? — hwæðer, which of two? — hwilc or hwylc, of what sort? The last two are regularly declined as indefinite adjectives The first is declined as follows. —

§ 81. As a Relative Pronoun, the Anglo-Saxon either uses the demonstrative se, seo, thæt, or employs the indeclinable the, and sometimes adds the latter to the former, as, se the, seo the, etc.

VERBS

§ 82. Verbs of Primary Inflection (Strong Verbs) These form the perfect without any addition, except the personal endings, after the root or stem Those which have the vowels ĕ or eo in the perfect, show traces of a primitive reduplication and are divided into several classes according to the vowels — æ (ea), æ, ă, ea ō (ĕ) — which they have in other parts of the verb In the examples, we give, 1 The infinitive, 2 The singular of the perfect, 3 The plural of the perfect, and, 4 The passive participle.

I healdan, hēold, heoldon, healden, hold spannan, spēn, spēnnon, spannen, stretch.

V. rōwan, rēow, reówon, rōwen, row hrēpan, hrēop, hrēopon, hrēpen, call.

Those which do not have ĕ or eo in the perfect are likewise divided into several classes, according to the vowels — a (ă, ea) before two consonants, a (ă, ea) before one consonant ă, ea, ō — which they have in the singular of the perfect indicative.

§ 83. In verbs of primary inflection, the vowel which appears in the infinitive belongs also to the present indicative and subjunctive, the imperative, and the active participle. The vowel which appears in the plural of the perfect indicative belongs also to the second person singular, and to the whole perfect subjunctive. But in the second and third person singular of the present indicative, a is changed to e, ă to æ, ō to ē, eó, eá, ū, to ỹ; and e, eo, to i. § 84. The form helpanne is a dative of the infinitive, and is used with the preposition tō

§ 85 When the plur of the pres ind and of the imper. is followed immediately by the subject pronoun (we, ge, etc), the ending adh is often dropped, the pronoun with a connective e taking its place, as, helpe we, helpe ge, etc, for helpadh we, etc The same change sometimes appears in the perf, as hulpe ge, for hulpon ge.

§ 86. In the pres ind, 2d and 3d sing, the vowel e is generally omitted from the ending, as, hilpst, hilpth This often causes euphonic changes, as, cwist, cwith, for cwedh st, cwedh dh, from cwedhan, to say, hlest, hlet, for hled-st, hled dh, from hladan, to load, blet, for blēt-dh, from blōtan, to sacrifice, cyst, cyst, for cȳs st, cȳs-dh, from ceosan, to choose

§ 87 The letter g at the end of a root generally becomes h, unless it is followed by a vowel, as, stihdh, stīh, from stigan, to mount In the dissyllabic forms of the perfect and in the passive participle, a final h of the root passes into g, a final dh into d, and in some verbs a final s into r, as, slagen, cweden, coren, passive participles of sleahan, to strike, cwedhan, to say, ceosan, to choose Final h of the stem is often syncopated in the present and infinitive, as, slean, seon, for sleahan, to strike, seohan, to see From seon, to see, come pres seo, syhst, syhth, plur seodh, perf sāh, sāwe, seah, plur. sāwon, pass part gesewen

§ 88 Verbs of Secondary Inflection (Weak Verbs) These form the perfect by adding de to the root of the verb They are divided into two classes according as de alone, or o de, is added to the root The passive participle is formed by adding d and od in the two classes, and often with ge prefixed, as, geheġd, hid, geerod, plowed from lecgan, erian ge is also used, but not so frequently, in the passive participle of primary verbs

§ 89 In the first of these two classes, de after c, t, h, s, becomes te, and c is then generally changed to h Several verbs show a change of radical vowel in the perfect, from e to ea, and from ē to ō

§ 90 In the pres ind, 2d and 3d sing, e is often omitted from the ending, with euphonic changes, as in verbs of primary inflection The verb ner-ian, to preserve, has ner-e st, ner e dh: it takes e also in the sing of the imper, ner e, in the whole perf, as ner-e de, and in the pass part, as ner-e-d, but in all other forms has i before a or e (as, neriadh, neriende, etc) like verbs of the following second class. And the same is true of a few other verbs in which the stem is a short syllable, as, cnys-ian (or cnyssan), to beat, tel ian, to tell (but tellan makes perf. tealde)

Instead of sēcadh before a subject pronoun, we have also sēce.

§ 91. For the second class, we give as

Paradigm lufian, to love

Instead of lufiadh before a subject pronoun, we have also lufie.

§ 92 In these verbs, ie is often written as ige, and ia as iga or igea, where g has the sound of a consonant y, thus, lufige, lufigeadh. Before d of the perf, a is sometimes written in the sing, and e in the plur., instead of the regular o

§ 93 The verb leofian, to live, belongs to this class, but generally takes libb in place of leof, as, inf libban, part libbende: pres. 1. libbe, 2. leofast, 3. leo fadh, pl. libbadh, imp. leofa, pl libbadh; perf. leofode; pass. part. leofod. The verb habban or hābban, to have, is still more irregular: it makes pres 1 habbe, 2 hafast, hifst, 3. hafadh, hifdh, pl. habbadh; imp. hafa, pl. habbadh; perf hāfde, pass. part. hāfed or hāfd.

§ 94 Anomalous Verbs A There are twelve preteritive verbs, in which an old perfect of primary formation came to be used in the sense of a present, after which a new perfect was added with secondary formation. These are unnan, to grant, cunnan, to know, thurfan, to need, durran, to dare; gemunan, to remember, sculan, shall, should, māgan, may, might, āgan, to own, witan, to know, dugan, to avail, nugan, to suffice, mōtan, must. We give, in four columns, the pres. 1, 3 sing, the 2 sing, the plur., and the perf.: the VI., VII., etc, refer to the corresponding classes of primary verbs.

		Pres. 1, 3.	2 Sing	Plur.	Perf.

With 2 sing cunne, there is also a canst, const, with durre, a dearst.

Somewhat similar to these is (m) the verb willan, to will, which makes pres. 1 wille, 2 wilt, 3 wille, pl willadh, perf wolde So, too, nyllan (= ne willan), to be unwilling, pres. nylle, nylt, nylle, nylladh, perf. nolde.

§ 96 C. Several verbs which have the primary inflection in the perfect and the passive participle, appear in their other forms as verbs of secondary inflection Thus, biddan, bād, bædon, beden, ask, bid, sittan, sāt, sæton, seten, sit, licgan, lāg, lægon, legen, lie, thicgan, thah, thægon, thegen, touch, taste, hebban, hōf, hōfon, hafen, heave, lift, swerian, swōr, swōron, sworen, swear. All but swerian connect themselves with the first class of secondary verbs.

From fahan, hahan, contracted fon, to take, hon, to hang, come pres 1 fō, hō, 2. fēhst, fæst, fæhst, hest, hehst, hæst; 3 fedh, fædh, fæhdh, hedh, hēhdh, hædh, pl fodh, hodh. From the same roots, with added nasal, come fangan, hangan, perf. fēng, heng

The verb bringan, to bring, has two formations in the perf. and the pass. part brang, brungon, brungen, and brohte, brohton, broht, standan, to stand, drops n in the perf stōd, stōdon, standen: bregdan, to braid, brāgd, brugdon, brogden, often drops the g, and passes from the 6th class to the 7th, bredan, brād, brædon, broden: thihan, to thrive, thāh, thigon, thigen, of the 8th class, has passed into the form of the 9th, theón (for theóhan), thēah, thugon, thogen; and the same is true of sīhan (seón), to strain, tihan (teón), to convict, wrihan (wreón), to cover.

§ 97 D. The following verbs of secondary inflection are irregular: thencan, to think, perf. thohte; thyncan, to seem, perf thūhte; weorcan, wircan, wyrcan, to work, perf worhte, weorhte; bycgan, to buy, perf. bohte; gearwan, gyrwan, to prepare, searwan, syrwan, to equip, perf. gyrede, syrede, but pass. part., gegyrwed, gesyrwed. Būan, to inhabit, perf būde, but pass. part. gebūn: from the same root come būian (būgan, būgian), wīwian, of the second class.

§ 98. Missing Forms. The Anglo-Saxon has no future tense, but uses the present tense both as a present and as a future. The verbs wille and sceal are sometimes used, as in English, to express the future, but generally not without the idea of volition or of necessity, which properly belongs to those verbs.

The perfect definite and the pluperfect are supplied, as in English, by using forms of habban, to have, with the passive participle of the verb.

The passive is supplied by using the auxiliary verbs wesan, to be, or weordhan, to become, with the passive participle Thus eom and weordhe are used for the present passive, was and wearth for the perfect, beó or sceal beón for the future, eom — worden for the perfect definite, and was — worden for the pluperfect.

PREPOSITIONS AND CONJUNCTIONS.

§ 99. Prepositions are used with the accusative, dative, and genitive we give the simple prepositions, and some of the more important compound ones

With the accusative geond, beyond, through; thurh, through, by, ymb (ymbe), round, about, agen, ongeán, against, toward, abûtan, about, ymbûtan, round about, widhûtan, without, widhinnan, within.

With the dative. ûfter, after, ær, ere, æt, at, be, bi, by, concerning, fram, from, nedh, near; of, of, tô, to, intô, into; tôweard, toward, beâften (bâften), behind, beheonan, on this side of, betweox, betwixt, betwŷnan, between. bufan, above, bûtan, without, except.

With the genitive · andlang, along.

With the accusative and dative for, for; ofer, over; on, an, in, in, on, to, ûth, unto, under, under, beforan, before, gemang, among, tô geánes, toward, against, innan, within, uppan, upon, útan, without. These take the accusative when motion to a place, the dative when rest in a place, is either expressed or implied Mid, with, takes the accusative, and also the instrumental, which generally coincides with the dative

With the accusative, dative, and genitive · widh, with § 100. The most important conjunctions are ac, but, and, and, bûtan, unless; eác, also, elles, else, ge, and, gea, gese, yea, yes, gif, if, hûru, at least, yet, hwilt, lo, truly, hwâdher, whether, ne, not, nâ, nô, nese, not, nay, no, nu, now, odhdhe, or, swâ, so, as, swilce, as if, thât, that, theah, though, thonne, then, than, utan (with infin), let us, — for tham the, because, for thy, therefore, mid thy, since, seeing, tô tham thât, in order that, thy lês the, lest, — ge . ge, both . and, ægdher ge . ge, both . and, hwâdher the . . the, whether . . . or, nâdher ne . . ne, neither . . nor, odhdhe . . . odhdhe, either . . . or, sam . . . sam, whether . . . or, swâ . . . swâ, so as, as.

SEMI-SAXON INFLECTION.

§ 101. For the sake of convenience, A. will be used for the earlier text of Layamon, B for the later, and O for the Ormulum. It is proposed to represent chiefly the inflection of A in its characteristic features, adding at the same time the principal variations of B. and O.

§ 102 The Semi-Saxon retains in A. the Anglo-Saxon characters for the two sounds of English th we represent them, as before, by th and dh. B. and O. have only the character for th For the consonant y sound, the Semi-Saxon uses a peculiar character, ȝ this we represent by ȝ, while the y of the Semi-Saxon MSS will be given (as in A and B) by y Instead of this consonant y, a w is often used, especially in B, as Laweman for Layamon. In Semi-Saxon, as in English, the Anglo-Saxon hw is written wh (yet in B. simply w), and in like manner, O uses yh for hy, to denote the combination of h with a following consonant sound of y It must also be remembered in regard to the Ormulum, that by a uniform peculiarfty of orthography, a consonant is doubled where the vowel before it in the same word is short § 103 If we compare the Semi-Saxon inflection with the Anglo Saxon, we find, as the most striking difference, that the vowels a, o, u, in the old grammatical endings, are all changed to e Thus, the A S fiscas, fishes, fiscum, to fishes, caru, care, oxan, oxen, lufodon, they loved, become in Semi Saxon fisces, fiscen, care, oxen, lufeden. In A the vowel a is occasionally found in grammatical endings, but irregularly and capriciously used Next to this substitution of e for a, o, u, the most important differences are caused by the frequent loss of a final n thus, mid greatere heorte (A-S mid greatre heortan), with great heart, tha heye men (A-S tha heahan men), the high men The commencement of this change is seen in A, where the final n is occasionally dropped from many forms, yet not wholly discarded from any, and, as a natural consequence, it is sometimes added to forms that have no right to it thus, in the dat sing of the vowel-decl, than kingen (A-S tham cyninge), to the king, in feminines of the vowel-decl through most of the cases, as, layen (A-S lagu, lage, laga), law, laws, in the nom sing of adjectives in e, as, he wes bludhen (A S he was bludhe), he was blithe, and in the singular of verbs after e, as, ic habben (A-S ic hibbe), I have, he senden (A-S he sende), he sent In B and O, where the omission of a final n has become more fixed and regular, that letter is hardly ever misapplied in this way.

SUBSTANTIVES

§ 104 It is sometimes the case, even in A, that the accusative, both singular and plural, is used in place of the dative, as, than king (for than kinge), to the king, of kinges (for of kingen), of kings In B this is much more frequent, for the plural, at least, it is the prevailing usage. In O it has become the general rule · though the e of the dat. sing after a preposition is sometimes retained where the verse favors it (as to kinge), yet it is oftener omitted, and the inflection, sing nom dat acc king, name, gen kingess, namess, pl nom. gen dat acc kingess, namess, is the usual one for substantives of all classes and genders

§ 105. Vowel-Declension. The normal forms for the Masculine are, —

	Sing	Plur.	Sing.	Plur.
Nom	king	kinges	mete	metes
Gen	kinges	kinge	metes	mete
Dat	kinge	kingen	mete	meten
Acc.	king	kinges	mete	metes

But in the gen. pl., the more common ending is ene (or en), as, kingene (or kingen), for kinge (Compare A-S dagena, for daga, of days) For dat pl kingen, occurs also kinge, with omitted n, and in A for dat sing kinge, occurs also kingen, with n irregularly added A few words show in the nom. acc. pl the ending en (or e) irregularly brought in from the N-declension

For the use of the acc in place of the dat., which is common in B. and O., and for the gen pl. in ess which is common in O, see § 104.

§ 106 Sune, son, has in A. gen. sing. sune; wude (B. wode), wood, has nom. acc plur wudes or wude, but otherwise they are regular Man (or mon), gen mannes, makes men in the nom acc (and sometimes the dat) pl, but not in the dat sing, the gen pl is manne and mannen(e). O makes sing nom dat acc mann, gen manness, pl nom dat acc. menn, gen. menness

§ 107. The Neuters, as in A-S, are declined like the masculines, except in the nom acc pl here they are either without ending, as, wif, wife, wives, lond, land, lands, or they take en (rarely e), as in the N decl, as, wifen, londe But sometimes the ending es of the masc is applied to the neut, as, wifes, londes In B this is more common, and in O it is the general rule, yet even O makes shep, sheep, in the pl as in the sing, while from deor, animal, it makes pl deor, der, and deoress From child come nom acc pl. children (also childre in A, childres in B), gen childrene, dat. children O. makes childre as pl, of child, and lambre of lamb

§ 108. For Feminines the normal forms are —

	Sing	Plur	Sing	Plur.
Nom	laye	laye	dede	dede
Gen	laye	layen(e)	dede	dede
Dat.	laye	layen	dede	deden
Acc	laye	laye	dede	dede

For n added in A. after final e, see § 103. Where the nom sing ended originally in a consonant, e is generally added to it, as, deale, for A-S dæd, and the suffixes -inge, nesse, for A-S. -ing, -nes The nom acc pl have also the masc. ending es this is rare in A., but common in B, and nearly universal in O thus, B lawes, dedes, O layhess, dedess (rarely dede) Boc, book, makes boc in dat acc sing and nom acc pl, but bæc also occurs in nom acc pl B has bole in dat sing, and bokes in nom acc pl Burh, town, castle, makes gen dat acc. sing burh or burye (burhye), nom dat acc pl buryes or buryen, gen burye: but in B the gen dat sing is borewe, and the whole plural borewes. Weorld, world, sometimes makes the gen in es

§ 109. N-Declension. The normal forms would be —

	Sing	Plur	Sing	Plur.
Nom	stede	steden	heorte	heorten
Gen.	steden	steden	heorten	heorten
Dat	steden	steden	heorten	heorten
Acc.	steden	steden	heorten	heorten

§ 110 But this declension is much disfigured by the omission of the final n, which is frequent in A, and nearly universal in B For n sometimes added in A to the nom sing, see § 103 In B the nom acc pl are commonly made in es, the masculine ending of the vowel-decl, as stedes, steeds, heortes, hearts In O the peculiarity of this declension is wholly lost, as we see in name, gen namess, dat acc name, pl namess in all cases Yet from the neut eyhe, eye, gen eyhess, O makes the irreg pl. ehne A. and B have eye, gen. dat. eye(n), pl. irreg eyene(n)

§ 111. Feond and freond make in nom acc pl feond, freond, or feondes, freondes, or feonde(n), freonde(n)

§ 112 Fader, moder, brodher, suster, dohter, have the same form through the sing, and in the gen pl, but the gen pl sometimes takes ene or en. The other plural cases have en (es in B, ess in O) But for brodh(e)ren, we find also bredh(e)ren, and in O brethre is the only plural form of brotherr The e in brodher, suster, dohter, is often lost before a case-ending.

§ 113 The fem. nom acc niht, night, has nihtes in the gen. sing, nihte in the dat the pl is regular in A, but in B. is sometimes indeclinable, niht or nithi The fem. æ, running water, and sæ (B. sée), sea, are indeclinable in the singular

§ 114 In proper names of men, the genitive Caper hes, for Caperes, is sometimes found in A, oftener in B. that hes here is no real pronoun, is evident from the want of any genitive feminine similarly formed with hire.

ADJECTIVES.

§ 115. For the Indefinite Declension the normal forms would be —

Sing.	Masc.	Fem.	Neut	Plur
Nom	god	god	god	gode
Gen	godes	god(e)re	godes	godre
Dat	goden	god(e)re	goden	goden
Acc.	godne	gode	god	gode

116. For the Definite Declension they would be :—

Nom	gode	gode	gode	goden
Gen.	goden	goden	goden	goden(e)
Dat.	goden	goden	goden	goden
Acc.	goden	goden	gode	goden

§ 117 For n sometimes added in A to forms with final e, see § 103 On the other hand, n is often omitted in A from forms with final en, as gode for goden, and this is uniformly the case in B The endings es and re in the gen sing and pl are little used in B, the forms gode and god being used instead. By these changes, the difference between the definite and indefinite declensions became much less distinct, and it is not therefore surprising that, even in A, the one is sometimes used instead of the other with the definite article the definite forms are almost always used, but with other adjective pronouns and with the possessive genitive, it is quite common to find the indefinite

§ 118 In O the indefinite adjective has only the forms god for the sing. and gode for the pl, the definite only the form gode. Adjectives in e, as clene, clean, are therefore without inflection But the gen pl allre, of all, is still found with the superlative, as, allre firrst, first of all

§ 119 The comparative ends in re, and has only definite inflection The superlative ends in est, and is inflected both ways, but the indefinite superlative is undeclined in the sing, and takes only e (in A also en) in the pl

§ 120 Adverbs are formed from adjectives as in Anglo-Saxon thus, swidhe, strongly, very, from swidh, hæhliche (O hehlike), highly, radher, sooner

PRONOUNS.

§ 121 The personal pronouns of the first and second persons are declined in sing, dual, and pl. as in Anglo-Saxon The genitives are nearly confined to the possessive use The dual forms, though found in O, are unused in B. We have in B you, ou, and in O ywe, for eowe, eou; in O yunne for unc.

§ 122 The pronoun of the third person is thus declined —

Sing	Masc	Fem	Neut.	Plur
Nom	he	heo (yeo, ye)	hit	heo (hi, hii)
Gen	his	hire	his	heore (hire)

Acc.	hine	heo (hire)	hit	heom (ham, yam)

The forms in ( ) are those used in B, which also often uses him for hine Rare forms for the nom acc pl are theo in A, thare in B O has in the nom. sing fem yho (i e hyo), neut itt, in the acc sing masc himm, fem hire, neut itt, in the pl nom theyy, gen theyyre (and heore), dat acc theyym (and hemm)

§ 123 The possessive pronouns min, my, thin, thy, are declined as indefinite adjectives. Before a consonant min, thin, sometimes become mi, thi: mire, thire, take the place of minre, thinre But for all the forms with case-endings, B has only mine, thine The other possessives, unker(e), our (of two), unker(e) (O. yunnkerr), your (of two), ure or oure, our, cower or eow(e)re (B youre, yure, O yure), your, are undeclined. In O. hiss, his, is treated as an adjective, with pl hise.

§ 124 The indefinite article an — which is only the numeral "one" applied to this use — is declined, both in A and B, with the same peculiarities as min B often uses on, one, for an, ane, but, when n is dropped, it has a, never o A genitive ones is also found in B, and a gen. anes and dat ænne are met with in O

§ 125 The definite article is thus declined the forms in commas are found only in A

Acc.	thene	'tha,' the	that	'tha,' the

The variations, most of them orthographical, are quite numerous: thus, in A, tha for tha thæt, thet, for that, thas, thas, for thes, thære for there, etc in B, this for thes in both, thon for than, thane for than and thene Add theo for sing tha, and thase for pl tha

The form the is sometimes used in B as an indeclinable article for all cases and numbers Traces of this use are found even in A In O it has become general, though the antecedent of a relative pronoun takes, instead of the, a demonstrative, thatt, tha, or thise, thise

§ 126. The demonstrative thes is thus declined —

Acc.	thisne	'thas,' theos	this	'thas,' theos

For thas, which is confined to A., we find theos and thes in both A. and B. For thisses, thissere, thissen, B has almost always thisse. For most of the forms B. has also this used as an indeclinable demonstrative, and traces of this use are found even in A.

O. has sing. thiss, this, pl thisse, these; while it makes also sing. thatt, that, pl tha, those, approaching nearly to the later English usage.

§ 127 Swile or swulc (B. sock), such, is declined as an indefinite adjective. Ilk, declined with the definite article, is used for "the same"

§ 128 The interrogative pronoun wha, who? makes gen whes (only in A.) dat and acc. wham, whan, neut nom. acc what. These in B are spelled wa, wam, wan, wat The use of this pronoun as a proper relative begins to appear in B and O Whadher (B wather) is undeclined Whilc or whulc is declined as an indefinite adjective in B it is written wo(h)e, and begins to be used as a relative § 129. The relative pronouns in A are the and that, for all genders and numbers, the latter being especially used in reference to an indefinite or an omitted antecedent, also tha (more rarely theo), in reference chiefly to a feminine or a plural. In B and O, that has taken the place of all the rest, and become the general relative.

VERBS

§ 130. General Remarks In the inflection of the verb, the final en of the infinitive, the plural forms, and the passive participle, often loses the n in A, generally so in B., but rarely in O For n added in A to forms that end in e, see § 103

§ 131 The plural of the present indicative ends in edh (B. eth, A-S adh) But in O it has the ending enn, which came in, probably, from the subjunctive and the perfect, as, we hellpenn (A we helpedh, B we helpeth), we help. Some traces of this en, used in the pres ind, appear to be found even in A and B. The Anglo-Saxon use of e instead of adh, when the verb is followed by a subject pronoun, — as, helpe we, — appears also in the Semi-Saxon

§ 132 The dative of the infinitive in enne (or ene), with the preposition to, — as, to helpenne, — is occasionally found in A and B, rarely in O It is sometimes written with ende for enne, by a confusion with the active participle. But commonly the preposition to is prefixed to the infinitive in en, as, to helpen

§ 133 The active participle is singularly infrequent in the Semi-Saxon, and, partly perhaps on this account, became confounded with the verbal substantive in inge In A. the old termination ende (or inde) is still the prevailing one for the participle, but in B inge occurs about as many times as ende

§ 134 The passive participle very frequently takes the prefix i (A-S ge), which, however, is not confined to the participle thus, iboren (A-S geboren) = boren, born But this prefix is scarcely at all used in O.

§ 135. Verbs of Primary Inflection (Strong Verbs) The ten classes of the Anglo-Saxon are more or less confounded, as will appear from the following specimens We give the infinitive, the singular of the perfect, the plural of the perfect, and the passive participle. The vowels are given according to O., where they are written more consistently than in A and B

I. halden, held, helden, halden, hold.
fallen, fell, fellen, fallen, fall.
II. lēten, let, leten, lēten, let slæpen, slep or slepte, —, —, sleep.
III haten, het or hehte, hehten, haten, bid cnawen, cne(o)w, cne(o)wen, cnawen, know
IV hæwen, he(o)w, he(o)wen, hæwen, hew.
V wepen, weop (O wēpte), —, —, weep
VI. finden, fand, funden, funden, find.
delfen, dalf, dulfen, dolfen, delve.
biginnen, -gan, -gunnen, -gunnen, begin.
VII nimen, nām, nomen, numen, take yifen, yāf, yafen, yifen, give.
beren, bār, bæren, boren, bear.
cumen, cōm, comen, cumen, come.
VIII. drifen, draf, drifen, drifen, drive writen, wrat, writen, writen, write.
IX buyen, bæh, buyen, boyen, bow.
luken, læc, luken, loken, lock.
X faren, for, foren, faren, fare.
waxen, wex, wexen, waxen, wax drayen, droh, droyen, drayen, draw.

Most of these forms appear also in A and B, but accompanied often by other modes of spelling Thus, in some cases, o is used for a, and eo for e, as fond, bigon, nom, drof, wrot, for fand, etc, weox, weopen, for wex, wepen; holde, cnowe, B, for halden, cnawen In B., e is used for æ, and sometimes ea for a; as, hewe, yeaf, for hæwen, yaf In A, a, æ, e, are much confounded, as, halden, hælden, helden.

§ 138. The changes mentioned in § 87 are found also in the Semi-Saxon , as, droh, drew, from drayen (A-S dragan), to draw , sloyen, they slew, from slan (for slahan), to slay , coren (also chosen), from chesen, to choose From seon, sen, to see, come pres. 1 seo, se, 2 sehst (O seost, sest), 3 siht, seodh (O seth), pl. seodh (O sen), subj seo, se , perf sah, pl sæwen , pass. part seyen, sen

§ 139 Verbs of Secondary Inflection (Weak Verbs) The first class form the perfect by adding dē (or te, after a surd) directly to the root , before this te, a k or ch is sometimes changed to h, and the vowel e in the root to o , thus, sechen (O. sekenn), to seek,

EARLY ENGLISH INFLECTION.

§ 147 The periods in the history of our language which are known as the Old English and the Middle English, differ chiefly in the vocabulary in grammatical points they are not so far unlike as to require a separate treatment One can be briefer here, as the inflectional system is now reduced more nearly to its modern proportions , and in the Ormulum, which stands at the close of the Semi-Saxon period, we have already seen much of what is most striking in early English inflection. The object will be to represent especially the language of Chaucer in its characteristic features

§ 148 It must be observed at the outset, that the unaccented final e, which is silent in modern English, was generally pronounced by Chaucer A multitude of apparent exceptions are accounted for by noticing these two peculiarities in the poet's verse 1 The unaccented final e generally unites in one syllable with a vowel at the beginning of the next word , and this union takes place, even when the next word is a pronoun or adverb with initial h, or a form of the verb to have. 2 An unaccented final er is often treated as a part of the preceding syllable, its e being suppressed, especially where a vowel or h follows in the next word , and sometimes an unaccented final en or eth is treated in the same way. Many of the exceptional cases are undoubtedly attributable to variations and corruptions introduced by the transcribers.

SUBSTANTIVES.

§ 149. Nominative Singular Where the Anglo Saxon had a final vowel (a, e, o, u) in the nom. sing., the early English (like the Semi-Saxon) has e , as, ore, herte, eere, herde, lawe, elde (A-S ora, ox, heorte, heart, earc, ear, hirde, (shep)herd, lagu, law, yldo, age) Even where the Anglo-Saxon had a final consonant, most monosyllabic words have an added e as dede, sonne, youthe (A-S dæd, deed, sorh, sorrow geoguth youth), but the verbals in ung do not generally add e as, conning, less often conninge, cunning In Chaucer this final e is not unfrequently suppressed in pronunciation, and occasionally, after two consonants, in writing thus, herte is sometimes treated as one syllable, and sometimes written hert

§ 150 Genitive Singular The gen sing ends in es as, kinges names, from king, name In Chaucer the es is almost always a separate syllable Genitives without es are sometimes found, in accordance with earlier modes of inflection, as, myn herte blood, his lady grace, hir fader lond but heven king, A-S. heofon cyning, is properly a compound word

§ 151 Dative and Accusative Singular The acc sing is always like the nom the dat sing is usually so But where the nom ends in a consonant, a dative in e is often found with prepositions especially at the end of a line in verse, as, to bedde, with golde, in house, out of his slepe, from bed, gold, hous, sleep By a confusion of forms, this dat in e is occasionally used instead of the regular nom or acc , as child, but also childe, in nom and acc

§ 152 Plural The plur has es in all the cases, as nom gen. dat acc kinges, dedes, shippes, wyfes, names, hertes (A-S nom pl cyningas, dæda, scipu, wif, naman, heortan) In Chaucer the plural often ends in s alone (or es pronounced as s), especially where two or more syllables precede, as, shoos, pilgryms, lovers, frankeleyns, servantes (pronounced servants) Some words still retain the plural of the old N-declension , as, oxen, eyen (eyes), ashen (also asshes), shoon (also shoos), etc., while some others take n by mistaken analogy, as bretheren, sistren (also sustres), children (also childre or childer), kyn (kine), etc Some words, which were of neuter gender in the A-S., make the plur like the sing., as, pl deer, good, sheep, swin (swine), folk (or folkes), hors (or horses), thing (or thinges), yer (or yeres) The plurals with change of vowel are feet, gees, men, teeth, etc., as in modern English

§ 153. If the ending es (or s) is not used in the nom pl , it is added to form the gen. pl , as, folkes wyves, mennes soules, wymmens counseles

ADJECTIVES.

§ 154. Adjectives are inflected as in the Ormulum the pl of the indefinite adjective and both numbers of the definite end in e, as, yong man, yonge men, the yonge man, the yonge men In Chaucer this inflection is confined to monosyllables, all adjectives of two or more syllables, and of course all adjectives that end in e, are uninflected In occasional instances the indefinite adjective takes e in the sing , especially after prepositions or before names of persons On the other hand, e of the indefinite plural is sometimes omitted, when the adjective is a predicate, as, they were glad the predicate participle is almost always undeclined

§ 155 Chaucer has a remnant of the old gen pl indef in aller or alther, of all , as, at your alther-cost, alther best

§ 156 The comparative and superlative are formed as in modern English Superlatives of one syllable are inflected , as, the beste man, his laste word Change of vowel is seen in lenger, from long , strenger, strengest, from strong , elder, eldest, from old

§ 157 Adverbs are formed from adjectives as in the earlier language , either with the ending e , as, bright, faire, harde, longe, from bright, fair, etc , or with the ending ly (A-S lice, Semi Saxon liche, like), as, shortly, sothely, sikurly, specially, from short, soth, etc

PRONOUNS

§ 158 In the first person, Chaucer has I rarely yl and ich (for A-S ic, which is still found in Old Eng) In the second person, he has thou, ye, you (which are found also in Old Eng), for A S thu, ge, eow The dual forms are no longer met with In the third person, he has

Dat	him	hire	him	hem

The forms hire and here were pronounced hir, her, and were sometimes written so In the Old Eng we still find heo in the nom sing fem , and heo or hi, hii, in the nom plur

§ 159 Reflexives are made in Chaucer by adding self, or selve, or selven, to my, thy, him, hir, our, your, hem , as, myself, myselve, myselven, etc

§ 160 The possessives myn, thyn, in Chaucer, retain n before a vowel or h, seldom before other consonants they retain it also when used absolutely, i e , after the substantive, or without a substantive, or as predicates, in which cases, too, they admit of inflection , as, children myne, than be the glorie, neghebour of myne The possessives oure, youre, are pronounced our, your, and are sometimes written so when used absolutely, they usually take s oures, youres (in two syllables) Hire, her, and here, their, have the same absolute form (heres)

§ 161 Among the forms of the definite article which we have seen in the Semi Saxon, there are some that appear occasionally and irregularly in Old English , but the one form the is generally, and at length constantly, used for all genders and numbers The indefinite article an gives up its n, except before a vowel or h

§ 162 The demonstratives in Chaucer are sing that, pl tho, and sing this, pl these (pronounced as one syllable, and sometimes written thes, this) That in that oon, that other, sinks from a demonstrative to a mere article

§ 163 The interrogatives are who, what, whos, whom, which, whether, used as in modern English

§ 164 The common relative in Chaucer, as in the Ormulum, is that for all numbers and genders Instead of that, we sometimes find which that, as, Creon, which that was of Thebes king Which itself, or the whiche, is used as a relative, but chiefly after prepositions or in agreement with a substantive following We find also who, whos, whom, used as relatives , but they are comparatively rare.

VERBS

§ 165. The verbs of primary inflection (strong verbs) are now greatly reduced in number, many which once belonged to this order having taken up the secondary (weak) inflection In those which remain, the classes have become much obscured and confounded, as will be evident from the following examples, in which are given, as before, the infinitive, the singular of the perfect, the plural of the perfect, and the passive participle — fallen, fel, fellen, fallen.

I holden, held, helden, holden.
II leten, let, leten, let slepen, slep slepen, slept.
III. knowen, knew, knewen, knowen.
IV beten, beet, beeten, beten.
V wepen, weep, weepen, wept.
VI finden, fand, fonden, fonden.
helpen, halp, holpen, holpen.
kerven, carf, corven, corven bi ginnen, -gan, -gonnen, -gonnen.
VII. given, gaf, gaven, given.
beren, bar, beren, boren.
speken, spak, speeken, spoken.
comen, cam, comen, comen.
VIII. risen, roos, risen, risen. driven, drof, driven, driven writen, wrot, writen, writen
IX. chesen, chees, chosen, chosen.
crepen, creep, cropen, cropen
X shapen, shoop, shapen, shapen.
weaven, wex, wexen, waxen drawen, drough, drowen, drawen.

We also find slepte, wepte, crepte, secondary perfects for sleep, weep, creep; also fond, bigon, for fand, bigan, and founden for fonden In the forms of waxen, a and e are much confounded, and a participle woxen is met with Chaucer and others often use y for i, as, fynden, bygynnen, dryven, or e for i, as, geven.

§ 166 Final n. In the inflection of the verb, the final n of the infinitive, the plural forms, and the passive participle, is omitted with great freedom thus, to maken or to make, we knowen or we knowe, they sayden or they sayde, founden or founde An unaccented e, before the omitted n, is generally sounded in Chaucer, but was sometimes dropped in pronunciation, and occasionally so in writing , as, to let, they sayd

§ 167 Present Indicative. The first person singular still ends in e, which in Chaucer is generally sounded , as, I saye, I knowe The est (or st) of the second person singular occasionally drops the t , as, thou ne has (for hast) The third person singular ends in eth, from which e is sometimes omitted , as, telleth, cometh The 3d sing in es or s is not frequent in Chaucer Where the root ends in t or d, contraction generally occurs , as, sit for sitteth, byt for byddeth, stant for standeth , and in like manner rist for riseth In the plural the old ending eth is still found in Chaucer , as, we loveth , but the common termination is en (or e) , we loven (or love)

§ 168 Perfect Indicative Verbs of primary inflection make the second person singular like the first and third , as, thou ber, thou spak, thou sor but a few instances show the old ending e , as, thou were, thou gave , and a few others show the secondary est, as, thou lowest The plural has en (or e).

§ 169 Verbs of secondary inflection, add de to the root, either immediately, as, sayde, answerde, or with a connecting e, as, worshipede, servede In the former case, de after p, f, t, s, or gh, becomes te as, lepte, mette, kaste alighte de is changed to alighte, fast de to faste, send de to sende or sente, wend-de to wente, and the like I or other changes, see § 181 The final e of the 1st and 3d sing is often dropped , as, seyd, loved, went The 2d sing has est, the plural en (or e)

§ 170 Subjunctive The subjunctive in both tenses has e in the three persons of the singular, and en (or e) in the plural

§ 171 Imperative The singular of the imperative is the same as the root of the verb, as, spek (speak), ber (bear), com (come), yef (give) But verbs which have de in the perfect take e in the imperative , as, love, aske , and this is true of some others also , as, bygynne, telle The plural ends in eth (or th) , as, cometh, draweth, saith, goth, beth but in Chaucer this ending is occasionally reduced to e, as, holde (for holdeth) , and is frequently omitted altogether , as, tel (for telleth), tak (for taketh), let (always for letteth)

§ 172 Infinitive The infinitive ends in en (or n), but often drops the final n as, helpen, given, don, ben , or help, yive, do, be A few forms in Chaucer, like to doone, to sayne, appear to come from the old dative case of the infinitive

§ 173 Participles The old ending for the active participle, A S ende, Semi Saxon inde, is still found in the Old English , as, wepinde, weeping even Chaucer has it in a few instances under the form and , as, lepand, leaping But it has to yield more and more to the termination inge or ing (Chaucer ynge or ynge), which, in the Anglo-Saxon and other Teutonic languages, belongs solely to the abstract nouns of action

§ 174 The passive participle of primary inflection freely gives up the final n , as, comen or come, songen or songe It is thus often omitted in Chaucer from participles that always have it in modern English , as, given and yive, gon and go, ben and be The prefix i or y (A S ge) is often used by Chaucer before this participle , as, i maked or i maad, y brent (burnt), i-writen, y-corve (carved), i-be (been) , seldom before other forms of the verb.

Translation—At the midnight, when men were asleep, Arthur forth him went, 'noblest' [boldest] of all kings Before 'rode' [proceeded] their guide, until it was day-light, they alighted from their steeds, and righted their weeds. Then saw they not far, a great fire smoke, upon a hill, surrounded by the sea-flood, 'and' another hill there was 'most' high, the sea by it flowed 'full' [very] nigh, thereupon 'they' [he] saw a fire, that was mickle and most strong The knights then 'doubted' [knew not], to whether of the two they might go, that the giant were not aware of the king's movement.

For whi and I am a man ordeynd vnder power, hauynge vnder me knyytis; and I say to this, Go, and he goth, and to an other, Come thou, and he cometh, and to my seruaunt, Do thou this thing, and he doth. Sothely Jhesus, heerynge these thingis, wondride, and saide to men suynge him Trewly I saye to you, I fond nat so grete feith in Israel.

§ 195. The same, from Purvey's Recension of Wycliffe's Translation

But whanne Jhesus was come doun fro the hil, mych puple suede hym. And loo! a leprouse man cam and worschipide hym, and seide Lord, if thou wolt, thou maist make me clene And Jhesus helde forth the hoond, and touchide hym, and seide Y wole, be thou maad clene. And anoon the lepre of him was clensid And Jhesus seide to hym: Se, seie thou to no man, but go, shewe thee to the prestis, and offre the yift that Moyses comaundide, in witnessyng to hem And whanne he hadde entrid in to Cafarnaum, the centurien neiyede to him, and preiede him, and seide Lord, my childe lijth in the hous sijk on the palesie, and is yuel turmentid And Jhesus seide to him Y schal come, and schal hele him And the centurien answeride, and seide to hym Lord, Y am not worthi, that thou entre vndur my roof, but oonli seie thou bi word, and my childe shal be heelid. For whi Y am a man ordeyned vndur power, and hane knyytis vndir me, and Y seie to this, Go, and he goith, and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my seruaunt, Do this, and he doith it And Jhesus herde these thingis, and wondride, and seide to men that sueden him Treuli I seie to you, Y foond not so greete feith in Israel.

 When one letter of an improper diphthong, or of a triphthong, is marked, it is to be taken as representing the sound of the combination, and the letter or letters which are not marked are to be regarded as silent, as in āim, clāan, cōil, pēople, rąute, sōul, jōurnal, tōn, &c. The combined letters ce, ci, sci, se, si, ti, occurring before a vowel in a syllable immediately preceded by an accented syllable, are generally equivalent to sh, as in o'cean, ceta'ceous, so'cial, logi'cian, suspi'cion, suspi'cious, con'science, nau'seous, controver'sial, dissen'sion, mil'ital, ora'tion, fictitious, &c. Such syllables are not always respelled, as, in general, they will naturally be pronounced correctly by an English speaker. But in all exceptional, doubtful, or difficult cases, the appropriate respelling is used.

RESPELLING FOR PRONUNCIATION.—(1.) In respelling the French am, em, im, &c., the letters mq are not to be pronounced themselves, being designed simply to mark the vowel as nasal, that is, as pronounced through both the nose and the mouth at the same time.—(2.) The respelling of a word, when a number of related words follow, applies to all of them down to some other word which is respelled.

REFERENCES.—The figures which immediately follow certain words in the Vocabulary refer to corresponding sections in the Principles of Pronunciation.

ACCENT.—The principal accent is denoted by a heavy mark, the secondary, by a lighter mark, as in Su'perintend'ent. In the division of words into syllables, these marks, besides performing their proper office, supply the place of the hyphen, except in some compound and derivative words.

PRINCIPLES OF PRONUNCIATION,

WITH EXPLANATIONS OF THE KEY.

VOWELS.

§ 1. The vowel sounds in monosyllables and accented syllables are marked in the Dictionary by pointing the letters according to the Key. Each of the vowels will now be considered under three heads, viz, its regular long, and short, and its occasional sounds, as heard in monosyllables and in accented and unaccented syllables

I. VOWELS IN MONOSYLLABLES AND ACCENTED SYLLABLES

§ 2 Regular long sound, marked Ā, ā, as in āle, heard also in pāin, dāy, gāol, gāuge, āye, brēāk, veil, whey, &c.

NOTE.—This sound of a is in most cases a diphthongal, having a slight "vanish" in ē annexed to its "radical" or initial sound, as in pay, where the y may be regarded as representing the vanish Writers are not agreed as to the nature of the radical part, some considering it to be the sound of short e, while others assert that it is a distinct, though very similar, element, being, like the other long vowels as compared with their true corresponding short sounds, of a slightly less open quality —See §11, and §8, NOTE

§ 3. Regular short sound, marked Ă, ă, as in ădd, heard also in plăid, băde, &c

NOTE —This is a distinct element from the long a Like the other shut or stopped vowels (ĕ, ĭ, o, u, ŭ), its sound is exceedingly short, and has a certain abrupt, explosive character, which is hardly found in any language but our own With respect to its position in the scale of sounds, it is a palatal vowel, intermediate between ă and ĕ, the tongue being raised higher than for a, and not so high as for e

OCCASIONAL SOUNDS OF A.

§ 4 Sound of a before r, in such words as air, care, fare, bear, prayer, parent, marked Ā, ā The letter e has the same sound in a few words, such as there, where, their, heir, &c

Two errors in opposite extremes are here to be avoided 1 That of the vulgar, who pronounce where, whar, bear, bar, careful, car'ful, &c , 2 That of some among the educated classes, who pronounce pair, parent &c , as if spelt pay'er, pay'rent, &c As to the latter error, Mr Smart remarks in a private letter, "This is not English pronunciation it is a peculiarity of the Scotch," and, we may add, of the Irish and many Americans also

Some have considered the a in care as a distinct element, thus, however, is not admitted by Smart, who maintains that it is our long a in fate, and owes all its peculiarity to the subsequent r Such, also, is the statement of Dr Webster and most English orthoepists The sound of r in these words is what Smart calls a "guttural vibration,"—a sound which he represents by ur, and Dr Webster by er In care we touch lightly on the ā sound (the radical alone, without the vanish, see § 2), and then pass fully and strongly into the guttural vibration (cā'ur or cā'er), drawing the two as closely as possible into the same syllable—so closely that Smart (not aiming at philosophical exactness) speaks of the r as actually blending with the previous vowel In like manner, parent is sounded pā'ur-ent or pā'er-ent, and fairy has the sound of fā'er-y, as the word was actually spelt by Spenser in his "Faery Queen" Smart refers, also, with approbation to another mode of identifying the sound in question, viz, that of prolonging our short e before r Thus, their (with the e as in thĕn), drawn out into long quantity, gives us there (thar), and er (the first syllable in ĕrror) gives us ere or e'er (ār) Thus, in the view here presented, the initial sound should always be that of a in fate (the radical without the vanish, see § 2), though the final impression upon the ear is that of an open or broad sound, in consequence of the "opening power" of the r. In primitive words like flare, lair, pair, and the others mentioned above, it is very important not to dwell so long on the a as to make it diphthongal, for, if the close vanishing element of the vowel is retained, it is impossible for the open r to blend with it in the same syllable But in derivative words like flayer, layer, payer, it is essential to preserve the terminational sound of the a, in order to keep up a distinction between the two classes.*

Some, however, especially in New England, give these words a slightly different sound, viz., that of our short a before the r, in air, pronounced ăer, with a somewhat lengthened sound of the ă So hărry, with the first syllable protracted, gives us harry This sound is rather more open than the one mentioned above, and is apt, in the mouths of our common people, to become too broad and coarse If well executed, however, it is scarcely at all inferior to the other in smoothness and grace It is frequently heard among the well educated in England, there is a tendency in many to intermingle the two, and it often requires a nice ear to determine which is used Dr Webster, who adopted the former in his own practice, once remarked to the writer, that he regarded the difference as unimportant, provided the New-England sound be given without coarseness or undue breadth Those who attempt to unlearn it, and adopt the other sound, need one caution they almost uniformly go too far, and fall into the peculiarity of the Scotch, so pointedly condemned by Smart

§ 5 Sound of the Italian a, marked Ä, ä, as in arm, father, fär, heard also in ah, hearth, aunt, guard, ăre, &c

NOTE —This sound occurs, in monosyllables and in accented syllables before r final or r followed by another consonant (as in scar, tar, tart, yard, de bar', de part'), and in the derivatives of such words (as in scarred tarry, of, or resembling tar, debarring) But when a occurs, in an accented syllable, before r followed by a vowel or by another r, in a word not a derivative, it has its regular short sound, as in ărable, bărrow, tărry, to delay

The Italian a is the most open of all the vowel sounds, and is one of the extremes of the vowel scale, the other extremes being ē and ōo In its formation the mouth and throat are opened widely and the tongue is left in its natural position of rest It was formerly much more common in English than it is at the present day The loss of it to so great an extent has been an injury to our language, and any further exclusion of it is therefore undesirable Hence the tendency to pronounce the word health, hurth ought to be repressed

§ 6 Sound of a in certain words (chiefly monosyllables) ending in ff, ft, ss, st, sl, sp, with a few in nce and nt, marked Ă, ă, as in staff, graft, pass, last, ask, grasp chance, chant, &c

NOTE —Down to the close of the last century, words of this class were universally pronounced with the full Italian a Some especially among the vulgar, gave this too broadly, or with a kind of drawl (as pass like paase, fast like faast, —without sounding the s) so that Walker disgusted by this abuse, and having a prejudice against intermediate sounds marked all such words in his Dictionary with the sound of short a giving the vowel in past staff, &c the sound of that in păt stăff (the last) &c It will not be surprising—if we bear in mind the remark in § 4 on the extreme shortness and abruptness of this sound—that this change was strongly condemned by the orthoepists Jones declared it to be "a mincing affectation" and Mitford said, "No English tongue fails to express no English ear to perceive the difference between the sound of a in passing and in passive" No colloquial familiarity will substitute the one for the other Still the high character of Walker, and the increasing disgust for every thing like a drawl in speaking, gave currency to the change It prevailed in London, and in some of the larger cities of America, until there sprung up on both sides of the Atlantic what Smart has called a "new school" and an "old school" on this subject The extreme shortness of the a, as marked by Walker was still objected to and Smart, in his Dictionary, first published in 1836 censured Walker on this account saying "He allows no compromise between the broad Italian a with which a vulgar mouth pronounces ass and the sound narrower (if possible) than the a in at, with which an affected speaker minces the same word He therefore spoke of a "medium sound" of the a in words of this class saying 'We are apt, even in London to give a slight prolongation to the vowel (a) which would, in other cases be quite rustic This prolongation has passed into America, and is now heard extensively among the followers of Walker in this country It is a kind of drawl on the a in such words as last past fast &c Smart states, however, in a recent letter, that in England this prolongation is now wholly laid aside "Custom with us" he remarks, "is much changed It is no longer affectation to say ăss and grănt graft, &c, at present indicate the pronunciation of well educated London people under sixty five or sixty years of age" In other words, Walker's extreme short sound of stăff like staffs, and păss, like passive, is now adopted by many Londoners as the true and only proper sound †

The change introduced by Walker never had any great currency in this country, except in a few large cities, and in places immediately affected by their influence Our leading lexicographers, Webster and Worcester, declared against it Many who were taught it in childhood have since laid it aside, and there is an increasing disposition among our teachers and literary men to unite on some intermediate sound between the extreme broadness, or length, of the a in father, and the extreme narrowness, or shortness, of the a in fat That of Smart (mentioned above as now disused) was intermediate in quantity, and so also is another, which Fulton and Knight have introduced into their Dictionary, viz, a shortened sound of the Italian a They give the word "land" as an example of the long Italian sound (as in father, &c), and "last" of their short Italian sound, and mark with the latter the entire class of words now under

* Many accurate speakers protract the initial element of the ā sound in parent somewhat more than they do in care, pair, &c, while, at the same time, they are careful not to let it glide into the vanishing ē. So also in apparent, transparent, there, and some other words.

† It also appears from Mr Smart's letter that when he spoke of the above mentioned prolongation as a "medium sound" between the broad Italian a and the short a in at, he referred simply to its quantity, the sound being the same in quality with that of short a, and simply a "prolongation" thereof.

consideration, such as staff, graft, pass, last, ask, gasp, and a few words in nce and nt, as dance and chant In this way, they guard against that undue prolongation of the ä which offended Walker, and still retain in use one of the finest sounds of our language This is the sound recommended in this volume, and marked Ą, ą. Some might possibly prefer one a little less open, verging slightly more toward that of a in an, and there is certainly room here for a diversity of taste and practice among those who agree in the main point of rejecting the extreme shortness of Walker's sound If it be proposed, however, to give these words a sound intermediate in quality between the Italian a and our short a, one thing is important to be considered Mr Smart states, in answer to an inquiry on the subject, that, although he can exemplify such a sound, he is not aware that any thing of the kind is used among the educated classes in England The only alternative there seems to be between the Italian a and the extreme short sound of Walker, and it is natural and desirable that those among us who reject the latter should adopt the same sound with those who led the way in that rejection upon the other side of the Atlantic Any one who heard the lectures of Mr Thackeray during his visit to this country in 1855–6, and noticed his pronunciation, with reference to this subject, must have been struck with the definite sound of the Italian a which he gave to all words of this class He even gave that sound in the word answer, which, though common in England, is comparatively rare in America A gentleman who held for many years a high diplomatic station at the court of St James, told the writer that, except among Londoners, he almost uniformly heard the Italian a in such cases, especially among the officers of government, and the nobility and gentry with whom he was led to associate Such, also, is said by members of Oxford and Cambridge to be the case now at those universities, and some of the most eminent preachers of the kingdom, such as the Bishop of Oxford (Wilberforce), have been mentioned in confirmation of this remark It is for such reasons that the words in question are here marked with a shortened or brief sound of the Italian a, in accordance with the views and practice of Dr. Webster.

§ 7 Sound of broad a, marked Ą, ą, as in gll, tgll, hąul, sącąm heard also in sąuce, gąe, geȯrgie, fȯrk, grȯgt, bȯught, &c

Note —This has sometimes been called the German a, but is a broader and more guttural sound, being formed by a depression of the larynx, and a consequent retraction of the tongue, which enlarges the cavity of the mouth posteriorly

§ 8 Short sound of broad a, marked Ą, ą, as in what, wąnder, wąllow, &c , heard also in knowledge

Note —This is the extreme short sound of broad a, and coincides with the sound of o in not It differs, however, in quality as well as quantity from broad a, being a more open sound, that is to say, the aperture of the lips and the internal cavity of the mouth, though of the same shape in both cases, are somewhat larger for the former (a) than for the latter (ą), while the position of the tongue remains unaltered throughout Nor is this difference peculiar to ą and ą it also exists between the other pairs of vowel sounds that have essentially the same organic formation, but differ in length or duration in each case, that which is the briefer in quantity is the more open in quality of the two

There is a sound of a, as heard in salt, although, &c , which is intermediate between that in awe and that in what No distinctive mark is used to indicate this intermediate sound, but the inquirer is referred to this section from all words in the vocabulary in which the sound occurs —See § 21, Note

§ 9. An exceptional sound of a occurs in the words any, many It is as if they were spelled ĕn'y, mĕn'y, being the regular short sound of e.

§ 10. Regular long sound, marked Ē, ē, as in ēve, mēte, &c , heard also in Cæsar, bēard, fiet, lēisure, pēople, key, machine, field, œsophagus, quay, &c

Note —In the formation of this element, the tongue is raised convexly within the dome of the palate, pressing against its sides, and leaving only the smallest possible passage through which a vowel sound can be uttered Ē is therefore the closest lingual or palatal vowel, and is one of the extremes of the natural vowel scale, ä and ȯȯ being the other extremes.

§ 11. Regular short sound, marked Ĕ, ĕ, as in ĕnd, mĕt, heard also in many, aphæresis, said, says, fĕather, hĕifer, lĕopard, frĕend, assafœtida, bury, guĕss

Note —This is not a short sound of the long e It has usually been considered as the shut or extreme short sound of the a in fate, but most orthoepists at the present day, while allowing it to be a nearly related sound, regard it as distinct, being slightly more open than the radical part of ā, and lacking the vanish both are intermediate between ä and ē, the tongue not being so much depressed as for the former, nor raised so high toward the palate as for the latter. —See § 2, and § 3, Note.

Occasional Sounds of E

§ 12. Sound of e like ā (as in care, fair, bear, &c), marked Ē, ē, as in ēre, thēre, hēir, ē'er, &c This, as is stated in § 4, is the same sound with that of a in care. —See § 4

§ 13 Sound of e like ī, marked Ē, ę, as in eh, eight, prey, vein, &c —See § 2

Note —This is essentially the sound which this letter generally has in the leading modern languages of Continental Europe.

§ 14 Sound of e before r, verging toward the sound of u in urge, marked Ē, ĕ, as in ĕrmine, vĕrge, prefĕr, heard also in ĕarnest, mĕrth, myrtle, &c.

Note —The case here contemplated is that of e before r, in a monosyllable or in an accented syllable in which the r is not followed by a vowel or by another r, or in derivatives of such words, when the syllable retains its accent, as in herd, defer, deferring, err, erring, term, mercy, maternal. When e occurs before r followed by a vowel or by another r, in a word not derived as above, it either has the short sound, as in ferry, peril, perilous, heritage, ferule, or the long sound, as in period, hero, material.

The vulgar universally, and many cultivated speakers both in England and America, give the e in such words the full sound of u in urge, as, murcy for mĕrcy, turm for tĕrm, &c But, in the most approved style of pronunciation, the organs are placed in a position intermediate between that requisite for sounding ē and that for sounding ĕ, thus making (as Smart observes) "a compromise between the two" In other words, this element is radically distinct from both ē and ĕ, being less guttural than the former and less palatal than the latter, from which it was doubtless originally evolved.

It is a vulgarism among old people in New England, and also the error of some fashionable speakers, to change the ē into ĕ, or into a prolonged sound of ä, as, ärth or äärth for ĕarth, tärm or täärm for tĕrm. This can not be too carefully avoided.

I.

§ 15 Regular long sound, marked Ī, ī, as in īce; heard also in aisle, height, ęying, ęye, vīe, guīle, buy, thy, rye, &c ; in pīnt, in child, mild, wild; and in monosyllables ending with nd, as bind, find, kind, &c , except wind, meaning air in motion, and wĭnd, to scent, to cause to lose or to recover wind or breath.

Note —This sound, though represented by a single character, is not a simple element, but a diphthong It is composed of ä and ē as extremes, with the ä accented, but made so very brief that the ear with difficulty recognizes the precise character of the sound.

§ 16 Regular short sound, marked Ĭ, ĭ, as in ĭll, heard also in English, beau fin, been, sīeve, women, busy, guĭnea, nymph, &c.

Note —This is not a short sound of long ī Many have considered it as the shut or extreme short sound of long e, but it is really a distinct, though closely allied, element, and is so regarded by the best orthoepists at the present time. In its formation, the tongue is slightly relaxed from the position assumed for producing ē: this is the only difference between the two sounds. —See § 3, Note, and § 8, Note.

Occasional Sounds of I

§ 17 Sound of ī like that of long e, marked Ī, ĭ, as in pique, machine, caprice, &c —See § 10

Note —This is appropriately the sound of ī in all foreign languages. Most of the English words in which this sound is represented by this letter are from the French § 18 Sound of ĭ before r, verging toward u in urge, marked Ī, ĭ, as in ĭrksome, vĭrgin, thĭrsty, &c , identical with that of e in ermine.

Note —I, in this case, is sounded by many speakers like u in urge, as vurgin for vĭrgin The observations made under § 14 as to short e in words like ermine, verdure, &c , apply fully to this sound of the i.

O

§ 19. Regular long sound, marked Ō, ō, as in ōld, heard also in hautboy, beau, yeȯman, sew, roam, hōe, dōor, shōulder, grōw, ōwe, &c

Note —This sound of o is in most cases diphthongal, having a slight "vanish" in oo annexed to the "radical" or initial sound, as in below, where the w may be regarded as representing the vanish The radical part of the sound is a simple element, intermediate, with respect to the mode of its formation, between g and ōo, the tongue being less depressed than for g, and the labial aperture greater than for ōo It is essentially the same element as that described in the next section, but of a slightly less open quality The vanish of the o is omitted in unaccented syllables, as in o pinion, to-bacco, &c , but ought not to be omitted elsewhere This remark is important as bearing on a very prevalent error, which will be mentioned in the next section.

§ 20 It is exceedingly common, in some parts of the United States, to shorten the long o of certain words, as bolt, most, only, &c , by dropping the vanishing element which belongs to the vowel, and giving to the radical portion a somewhat more open quality, but this practice is wholly opposed to English usage The provincialism here pointed out obtains, more or less widely, in respect to the following words, viz boat, bolster, bolt, bone, both, broke, broken, choke, cloak, close, n , *coach, coat, coax, colt, colter, comb, dolt, folks, goad, hold, holm, holster, home, homely, hope, jolt, load, molten, most, molt, none, only, open, pole, poll*n, poultice, poultry, revolt, road, rode, rogue, soap, sloth, smoke, sofa, sol (the name of the note G of the musical scale), spoke, v , spoken, stone, story, swollen (or swoln), throat, toad, upholsterer, upholstery, whole, wholly, wholesome, wrote, yoke, yolk, and possibly a few others Most persons in New England sound the o in a part or all of these words without the vanish, while some go farther, and give to a number of them almost the sound of short u, as, hum for home, &c On this subject, Smart speaks strongly in the communication referred to above He insists that all such words should have the full sound of the o as heard in accented syllables, though not in all cases with quite the same prolongation of the sound. Thus the full o of dome should be given to home, of slope to hope, of pouch to coach, of moat to coat, of joke to spoke, cloak, smoke, and broke, of hone to bone and stone, and similarly in the other cases He adds, "I indicate hole and whole as identical in sound. As to holy and wholly, I prolong the vowel and middle consonant more in the first than in the second" This, in his view, is the only difference between them Still, the theoretic phonologist can not but regard the true short o described in this section as an important and legitimate member of the family of vowel sounds, and must look upon its absence in the established orthoepy of our language as a defect and an anomaly To him, therefore, its rise and growth in the popular speech are interesting facts, and its final prevalence and admittance to equal rights with the other vowels is a thing he would rather desire than deprecate

§ 21 Regular short sound, marked Ŏ, ŏ, as in ŏdd, nŏt, heard also in wander, knŏwledge, &c —See § 3, Note, and § 9.

Note —This is the shut or extreme short sound of broad a, and coincides with the sound of a in what There is a medium sound of this letter which is neither so short as in not, nor so long as in naught Smart says that this medium sound is usually given to the short o when directly followed by ss, st, and th, as in cross, cost, broth, also in gone, cough, trough, off, and some other words To give the extreme short sound to such words is affectation: to give them the full sound of broad a is vulgar.

Occasional Sounds of O.

§ 22. Sound of o like short u, marked o͝, o, as in other, dove, &c., heard also in does, gun, flood, double, &c. — See § 31.

Note. — The words combat and comrade are marked with this sound by many orthoëpists, but there is equal or greater authority for the regular sound, cŏmbat and cŏmrade. The o in sovereign had originally this sound, but (as is stated by Smart) has in England, for the last twenty years, been gradually passing into the short o (sŏvereign), until this is now the prevailing sound.

§ 23. Sound of o like o͞o long, marked o͞, o͞, as in prove, do, move, tomb, &c. — See § 26.

§ 24. Sound of o like o͝o short, marked o͝, o͝, as in bosom, wolf, woman, &c — See § 8, Note, and § 27.

Note. — This sound coincides with that of u in bull, which is also used for o͝o short. — See § 33.

§ 25. Sound of o like a (broad a), marked o̍, o̍, as in order, form, stor'l, &c — See § 7.

Note. — The letter o has this sound when it occurs before r in a monosyllable (as in for, form, lord, north) or in an accented syllable when not followed by a vowel or by another r, as in for'mer, or'chard, abhor', and also in the derivatives of such words, as in formed, north'ern, abhor'ring. But when o occurs, in an accented syllable, before r followed by a vowel or by another r in a word not a derivative, it has its regular short sound, as in for'ci-yn, or'ange, tor'rid. These two sounds of o, viz, the broad, like that of a in call, and the short, like that of a in what, have been confounded by some orthoepists, but there is an obvious difference between them, not only in quantity, but also in quality, the short vowel being more open than the broad. — See § 8, Note.

OO.

§ 26. Regular long or open sound, marked o͞o, o͞o, as in moon, food, heard also in rhythm, drew, to, canoe, manœuvre, group, ruby, rue, recruit, &c.

Note. — This sound is the same element with the u of the Germans, Spaniards, and Italians, and coincides with the French ou in route. It is the closest labial vowel, that is to say, in forming it, the lips are more nearly closed than for any other vowel, the sides being brought into contact with each other so as to leave only a small central aperture for the escape of the voice.

§ 27. Regular short sound of oo, marked o͝o, o͝o, as in wood, foot, heard also in wolf, should, bull, &c. — See § 8, Note.

Note. — Walker and a few other orthoepists mark the words book, brook, cook, hook, and others ending in -ook, to be pronounced with the long sound of the o͞o, as in food, but the best authorities at the present day, and the best and almost universal usage, are decidedly in favor of the regular short sound of the vowel.

§ 28. The following words, room, root, roof, rood, broom, and soon, have properly the long sound of oo, as in food (see § 26), but many pronounce them with the short sound, as in foot (see § 27). New Englanders especially are often recognized abroad by their habit of pronouncing room, rōom, root, rōot, roof, rōof, rood, rood, broom, brōom, and soon, sōon. Smart properly insists that the quality of the sound in soon should be the same as in moon, though the vowel is hardly so much prolonged in quantity, except in dignified utterance.

U.

§ 29. Regular long sound, marked u͝, u͝, as in mute, dust, &c, heard also in beauty, feudal, food, pew, ewe, lieu, view, clue, suit, you, youth, yule, &c.

Note. — This is a compound sound, formed of the vowel oo, with a slight sound of the consonant y or of the vowel e or i before it. When the u begins a syllable, or is preceded by any one of the palatal or labial sounds k, g, p, b, f, v, m, the sound of y is clearly perceived, as in the words usage, cube, yules, puny, burn, future, mule.

§ 30. When the long u is preceded, in the same syllable, by any one of the consonants d, t, l, n, s, and th, it is peculiarly difficult to introduce the sound of y, and hence negligent speakers omit it entirely, pronouncing duty, dooty, tune, toon, lute, loot, nuisance, noosance, suit, soot, thurible, thoorible, &c. The reason is, that in forming these consonants the organs are in a position to pass with perfect ease to the sound of oo, while it is very difficult in doing so to touch the intermediate y, hence the y in such cases is very apt to be dropped. On this point Smart remarks, "To say tube (tyoob), lucid (lyoocid), with the u as perfect [i e, with a distinct sound of y prefixed to oo] as in cube, cubic, mute, &c, is either northern or laboriously pedantic," — a description which applies to the vulgar in our Eastern States, and to those who are over-nice at the South. The practice of good society is to let the y sink into a very brief sound of long e or of short i, both of which have a very close organic relationship to consonant y. Special care must be taken not only to make this sound as brief as possible, but to pronounce it in the same syllable with the oo. We thus avoid the two extremes, of overdoing, on the one hand, by making too much of the y, and, on the other hand, of sounding only the oo after the manner of careless speakers.

It ought to be added that wherever the sound of sh or of zh precedes the u, the y is omitted, as in sure, sounded shoor, sugar, shoogar, azure, azh'oor, &c.

§ 31. Regular short sound, marked u̍, u̍, as in but, heard also in sun, does, blood, touch, &c.

Note. — This is not the short sound of long u. It is a distinct and simple element, and derives its peculiar guttural character from the influence of the pharynx and back part of the mouth. In its organic formation, it is essentially the same sound as u in urge, but is shorter in quantity, and of a rather more open quality. — See § 3, Note, and § 8, Note.

Occasional Sounds of U.

§ 32. Sound of u when preceded by r in the same syllable, marked u̐, u̐, as in rude, rumor, rural, &c.

Note. — All the English orthoëpists agree that the u in this case drops the y or i which is generally an element of its compound sound when preceded, in the same syllable, by any other consonant than r, and becomes simply o͞o, so that rue is pronounced rōo, rule, rōol, ruby, rōoby, &c. On this subject, Dr Webster's views have been greatly misunderstood. Many suppose that he wished to insert a distinct sound of y in such cases, pronouncing rule, ryool, and ruby, ryooby, &c. Nothing could be further from his views or practice. No one had a greater disgust for such a prolongation of the sound. The whole question here turns on the analysis of our long u. Dr. Webster did not regard it as diphthongal, except at the commencement of a syllable, as in unite. In all other cases he looked upon our long u as a distinct and peculiar vowel, nearly resembling ē and o͞o, but so much closer as to be properly considered an elementary sound, and he therefore marked it (as he ought to do on that supposition) in one and the same manner in all such cases. This has given rise to the supposition that he favored the insertion of y in such words as rule, &c. The fact is, on the contrary, that, according to his scheme, there is no y in the case to be inserted.

In this volume, the ordinary view has been adopted; viz., that the u is, in most cases, diphthongal, as described in § 30, but that, when preceded by r, it is equivalent to o͞o merely. This has been done in conformity to the general understanding of orthoepists, without undertaking to decide the abstract question whether u following r in the same syllable is diphthongal or not. Some may think, in substantial agreement with the views of Dr Webster, that in graceful pronunciation there is a very slight softening sound like that of ē or ĭ between the r and the vowel in such words as rue, rule, rude, &c. (Compare § 30.) Others may consider this as a mere provincialism, but the great body of speakers do undoubtedly pronounce this class of words with no other vowel sound than o͞o, as marked by Smart and other English orthoepists.

§ 33. Sound of u like that of short oo (o͝o), marked u̯, u̯, as in bull, put, push, pull, &c. — See § 8, Note, and § 27.

§ 34. Sound of u before r in such words as urge, burn, furl, concur, &c., marked u̐, u̐, heard also in worm, journey, &c.

Note. — This is often called the natural vowel, because it requires almost no effort to utter it, the mouth being slightly opened in the easiest or most natural and unconstrained manner for the passage of voice in a nearly unmodified form. But the name is scarcely appropriate, for the sound is altogether wanting in many languages, and — with the single exception of the English — it occupies a comparatively subordinate place in the vowel systems of the principal tongues in which it occurs. It has been more aptly termed the neutral vowel, with reference to its want of any strongly marked distinctive character, and this name is here adopted as, on the whole, preferable to any other. The sound differs from that of short u (with which it has often been identified) in length, and in a somewhat greater degree of closeness (See § 8, Note.) It occurs, in monosyllables, before r not followed by a vowel (as in cur, fur, furl, hurt, burst, purr), in accented syllables, before r final or r followed by one or more consonants different from itself (as in recur', cur'few, fur'long, disbursed'), and in derivatives from any such words (as currish, furry, purring, recurring). Except in the cases here specified, the letter u before r has its short sound, as in cŭr'ry, hŭr'ry.

§ 35. Regular long sound, marked ӯ, ӯ, as in fly, style, sky, edify, &c.

Note. — This is the same sound as long i. — See § 15.

The word my, when used without emphasis, takes its regular short sound in England and to some extent in this country as, "I took down mў hat." This sound, however, should not be given in serious or solemn discourse, nor should the y ever be turned into long e, after the Irish fashion, 'I took down mee hat." According to Walker, Smart, Worcester, and Cooley, the word by is, in like manner, colloquially pronounced bў, when not emphatic, but this pronunciation is very rarely heard in the United States.

§ 36. Regular short sound, marked y̆, y̆, as in cyst, nymph, lyric, abyss, coinciding with the sound of short i. — See § 16.

Occasional Sound of Y.

§ 37. This only one occasional sound, viz, in such words as myrrh, myrtle, in which it has, like the e and i in similar circumstances (see § 14 and § 18), very nearly the sound of u in urge. This is indicated in the Dictionary by respelling, the words in which y has this sound being very few in number.

II. REGULAR OR PROPER DIPHTHONGS.

OI or OY.

§ 38. The sound of oi or oy (unmarked), as heard in oil, join, oyster, &c.

Note. — The elements of this diphthong are o as in cord (the same as broad a), and ĭ as in fin (short i), with the accent on the former. Oy is always regular in English words, and oi is regular also except in the following cases, viz, avoirdupois (av-er-du poiz'), connoisseur (kon-is-soor'), shamois (sham'my), choir (kwire), tortoise (tor'tis), turquois (sometimes pronounced tur-keez').

Until near the beginning of the present century, oi was extensively pronounced like long i, as jine for join, rile for roil, &c., but this pronunciation is now confined exclusively to the lowest classes.

OW.

§ 39. The sound of ow (unmarked), as heard in owl, vowel, flower, &c.

Note. — This diphthong is compounded of the elements ă and o͝o, the former of which is accented, but made extremely brief. In a considerable number of words, ow represents the sound of long o in the single word knowledge and in its derivatives, it has the sound of short o. These are accordingly distinguished by the proper mark, as, blŏw, slŏw, knŏw, knŏwledge, &c.

OU.

§ 40. This diphthong has two leading sounds.

(1.) That of ow in words derived from the Anglo-Saxon, as in out, hound, &c.

(2.) That of o͞o in words derived from the French, as in soup, group, &c.

Note. — The word route, being directly from the French, is perhaps more commonly pronounced by careful speakers with the French sound (roōt), while rout has the Anglo-Saxon sound of ow. The word wound, which, from its Anglo-Saxon origin, ought to have the sound of ow, has, to a great extent, taken the French sound (woond), notwithstanding the remonstrances of Walker and other orthoëpists against the irregularity.

§ 41. The diphthong ou has also, in a number of words, the sound of long o, as in sōul, in a few cases, the sound of the broad a, as in bought (bawt), sometimes that of short u, as in coūple, sometimes that of ŭ in urge, as in adjŏŭrn (adjurn), and, in the three words could, would, should, that of o͝o as in foot. These peculiarities are indicated in this Dictionary by the appropriate mark over the significant or sounded vowel, or by respelling

III VOWELS IN UNACCENTED SYLLABLES.

§ 42 When an unaccented syllable ends in a consonant, its vowel, if single, has, in strict theory, its regular short or shut sound, though uttered somewhat more faintly, or with a less proportionate force, than in an accented syllable, as in ăs-sign', con'dŭct, con'flict, &c In many words of this class, however, the vowel is apt to suffer a change or corruption of its distinctive quality, passing over into some sound of easier utterance Thus the vowel sounds in the unaccented syllables ar, er, ir, or, yr (as in altar, ofēr, tapir, mirror, zephyr), are coincident with that of the second u in sulphur As a general rule, a and o, in unaccented syllables ending in a consonant, verge toward, or fall into, the sound of short u, particularly in colloquial discourse, as in bal'lad, bar'rack, ver'bal, bed'lam, cap'stan, jal'up, bi'as, bal'last, hav'oc, meth'od, pis'tol, ven'om, compel', flag'on, bish'op, pi'lot, prov'ost In such words, it would ordinarily be the merest pedantry or affectation to give the vowel its regular short sound

The vowel e, in unaccented syllables ending in a consonant, is, in some words, liable to be sounded like short i (as in barrel), and, in others, like short u (as in silent), but these changes are usually avoided by good speakers.

It may here be remarked, that some of the diphthongs are similarly affected by the absence of accent Thus ai, which, in an accented syllable, is usually sounded like long a (as in com plāin'), sinks into ĭ or ŷ in an unaccented syllable, as in mountain, pronounced moun'tĭn or moun'tin So ei, ey, and ie become changed in pronunciation into ĭ (as in sur'fĭt, hon'ĕy, car'rĭed), and ou is sounded as ŭ (as in gran'dŭur)

It is also to be observed, that, in the unaccented syllables of some words from the Latin, the vowel is long, though followed by a consonant in the same syllable, as in cantharidēs, but, in such cases, the long mark is, in the Dictionary, placed over the vowel

§ 43 When the unaccented syllable does not end in a consonant, two cases arise, viz,—

(1) The syllable may consist of, or may end in, a vowel, as in the words a-bound', di rect', e-vent', mo-lest', &c

(2) The syllable may end in a consonant, with final e mute at the close of words, as in ul'ti-mate, fi'nite, rep'tile, &c

The former of these will, for the sake of brevity, be called No. 1, the latter No 2 These will now be considered under each of the vowels

A.

§ 44 (No 1 See § 43) Here the a has properly a brief sound of the Italian a, as in Cu'ba, a-muse', A-mer'i-ca but, in familiar speech, it is almost always so slighted and obscured as to be indistinguishable from the neutral vowel, or u in urge, murmur, &c In some words, like ā-e'ri-al, chā otic, &c, the a has its regular long or name sound, somewhat shortened by the omission of the "vanish" This is due to the influence of the subsequent vowel, which, in fluent utterance, refuses to take the Italian a before it without the intervention of one or more consonants Some speakers in this country give the same brief sound of long a to this letter when it occurs in an initial unaccented syllable followed by a consonant in an accented syllable, as in a bound', fa tal'i ty, but this practice is not sanctioned by the best orthoëpists Formerly, a final had the same sound, especially in proper names, as, I de'a, A'sa, so'fa, Vir-gin'a, Sen'e-ca but this easily slid into ĕ or ŷ, and by careless speakers was omitted after e and i, as, I-de', A'sy, so'fy, Vir-giu'y, &c,—pronunciations still heard among illiterate people In the terminations -acy and -a-ry, the a has usually the same sound as short e unaccented, as in mis'ted*le*-ny, mo'ment*a* ry, &c

§ 45. (No 2 See § 43) Here the a has sometimes its long sound, particularly in verbs ending in ate, as, ded'i-cāte, cd'u-cāte, &c In other parts of speech, the sound of the a is more obscure, verging toward short e, as in ul'ti-mate, night'in-gale, pref'ace, &c In some instances it is apt to verge toward short i, as in vil'lage

§ 46 (No 1 See § 43) Here the e has its long sound, slightly obscure or abridged, as in e-vent', e-mo'tion, so ci'e ty, &c Care should be taken not to sink the e into an indefinite sound of short u, as, soci'ŭty for society, &c

§ 47. (No 2 See § 43.) Here, also, the e has usually its long sound a little shortened and slighted, as in ob'so-lete In a few instances, it verges toward short e, as in coll*e*ge

I.

There is great diversity in the case of this letter Hence it is difficult to lay down general rules, and Smart remarks, "The inquirer must be sent to the Dictionary to learn, in each particular case, the true pronunciation"

§ 48 (No 1 See § 43) I, when final in a syllable, has more commonly its short sound, as in phi-los'o-phy, di rect', &c But the i is usually long in the initial syllables i, bi, chi, cli, cri, pri, tri, as in ī-de'a, bī-ol'o-gy, crī-te'ri-on, prī me'val, &c.

§ 49. (No 2. See § 43.) In these terminations, usage is greatly divided. On the whole, the i is more generally short, as in ac-com'plice, in'fi-nite, fer'tile, mar'i-time, ad-a-man'tine, an'tse, pos'i-tive, &c.; but there are some important exceptions, as, cock'a-trice, ex'ile, gen'tile, con'cu-bine, ar'chive, &c.; also all names of minerals ending in lite or ite; as, chrys'o-lite, ste'a-tite, &c. Here the Dictionary must be consulted for the several words. According to Smart and Cull, chemical terms ending in ide (as bromide, chloride, &c.) should be pronounced with the i long, but all other orthoëpists are unanimous in making the vowel short, and the propriety of the latter mode of pronunciation is established by the fact that this whole class of words is not unfrequently spelt without the final e, thus, bromid, chlorid

O.

§ 50 (No 1 See § 43) Here the o has usually its long sound slightly abbreviated, and without its "vanish" (see § 19), as in o-pin'ion, croc*o*-dile, to bac*co*, &c Care should here be taken not to sink the o into short u, as careless speakers often do, pronouncing o-pin'ion, up pin'ion, &c. An exception, however, is perhaps to be made in the case of the terminations -o-ny and -o-ry, in which, according to universal usage in England, the o is sounded like short u unaccented, as in mat'ri-mo-ny, prom'is-so-ry, &c. Yet most speakers in this country give the o in such words its long sound, slightly abbreviated, as in other unaccented syllables. The practice—too common among us—of laying a secondary accent on the o is a fault which should be sedulously avoided. —See § 110

§ 51 (No 2 See § 43) The o in these terminations has usually its regular long sound, as in tel'e-sc*ō*pe, ep'*ō*de, &c Sometimes it has the sound of short o, as in di'a l*ŏ*gue In other cases, it verges toward short u, as in pur'pose.

U.

§ 52 (No 1 See § 43) Here the u generally has its long sound slightly abridged, as in ac'cu rate, e-mol'u-ment, man-u-mit', an'nu-al, dep'u-tize, u-til'i ty. But when the u is preceded by d, t, or s, these combinations, du, tu, and su, are by the great majority of speakers changed into joo, choo, and shoo or zhoo, respectively, as in ed'u-cate (ĕj'oo kate), ha-bit'u-al (ha bich'oo-al), sen'su ous (sĕn'shoo-us), vis'u al (vĭzh'oo-al). (See §§ 66, 77, 92, 93, 95, and 107.) In the notation of words of this class in the Dictionary, the regular pronunciation is generally given instead of the irregular, in conformity with the views of Dr Webster, but, in many instances, reference is made to the remarks contained in the present section When the u is preceded by r, it simply drops the y sound, and is pronounced oo, as in e'ad'tion (er-oo-dish'un) (See § 32) Care should be taken never to sink the u into the sound of short y or i, as, eddycate for educate, or into any indefinite sound

§ 53 (No 2 See § 43) The u in these terminations should generally retain its regular long sound (see §§ 29, 30) slightly abridged, as in grat'i-tūde, in'sti*tūte*, rid'i*cūle*, trib'ūte, im post'hūme, sub'ter-fūge, &c There are a few exceptions, as min'ute (min'it), u, and lef'tuce (lef'tis) If the letter r precedes the u, the initial element of the vowel is dropped, as in ce'rule (se'rool), per'uke (pĕr'ook), &c (See § 32) On the other hand, when the u is immediately preceded by the letter t, it should never be changed into mere oo, as grat'i-tood for grat'i*tūde*, in'sti toot for in'sti*tūte*,—a practice which prevails among the vulgar

The terminations dure, ture, and sure, though sometimes pronounced with the regular sounds of the letters, are more commonly pronounced joor, choor, and shoor or zhoor, respectively, as in the words tem'per-a-ture (tem'per-a choor), ver'dure (ver'joor), cy'no*sure* (sī'no shoor), ex po'sure (eks-po'zhur). (See §§ 66, 77, 92, 93, 95, and 107.) When these terminations are immediately preceded by an accented syllable, many speakers change them still further into chur, jur, and shur or zhur, as in na'ture (na'chur), ver'dure (ver'jur), cen'sure (sen'shur), ex po'sure (eks po'zhur) The Dictionary follows the practice of Dr Webster in giving to dure and ture the regular sounds of d, t, and u (pronouncing verdure, vĕrd'yoor, creature, kreet'yoor, &c), while sure is respelt shoor or zhoor, as in the examples given above This, it is true, is an inconsistency, but it is one of little moment, inasmuch as general usage is so fluctuating and as reference is in most cases made to the present section.

There is a vicious pronunciation of ture like tur, as na'tur for nature, which is heard, at the present day, only among the most illiterate speakers, but which, as shown by White (Shakespeare, vol xii, p. 117) and others, was formerly in general use among the politest and best educated classes of society.

§ 54 (No 1 See § 43) Here y has usually its short sound, as in hȳ-poc'ri-sȳ, mȳ thol'o gȳ, vau'i-tȳ, mer'ri lȳ, proph'e-cȳ, &c., but verbs ending in fy have the y long, as in jus'ti fȳ, mag'ni fȳ, &c, also the three following verbs, oc'cu-pȳ, mul'ti-plȳ, proph'e-sȳ

§ 55 (No 2 See § 43) The y in these terminations (which are few in number) is generally long, as in an'o dȳne, per'i ōȳle, ne'o-phȳte, pros'e lȳte, &c

IV SILENT VOWELS.

§ 56. Vowels which are printed in Italics are not to be sounded, as the e in used, burden, the i in cousin, &c Some of these cases require a more particular consideration, and will now be mentioned.

E final.

§ 57 The letter e is always mute when final, except in monosyllables con taining no other vowel, in classical words, and in some words from modern foreign languages; but, in a monosyllable or in an accented syllable of a word, though silent, it generally serves the purpose of indicating that a preceding single vowel followed by a single consonant, a consonant digraph, or the combined letters st or ng, has its regular long sound, as in pane, hope, cube, inscribe, paste, change. When a silent e follows c or g at the end of a word, it serves also to show that the consonant is to have its soft, and not its hard, sound, as in ace, nice, age, huge, oblige. In a number of monosyllables (as bāde, cōme, gīve, wēre, dōne, &c.) and in the accented syllables of a few words derived from them (as forbāde', becōme', forgīve'), the e does not have its usual effect of lengthening the sound of the preceding vowel In unaccented syllables, it sometimes keeps the vowel in its long sound, as in gen'tīle, su'pīne, fi'nīte, ar'chīve, but in a great many instances it exercises no such influence, as in jus'tice, hos'tile, mar'i-time, doc'trine, an'ise, gran'ite, plain'tive.

EN with E silent.

§ 58 Most words ending in en drop the e in pronunciation, as, often (of'n), heaven (heav'n), even (ev'n), &c. One of the most prevalent errors of the present day, especially among our clergy (for the laity have fallen into it much less), is that of pronouncing the words even (ev'n) evun, heaven (heav'n) heavun or heaven, often (of'n) often, &c Walker remarks with great keenness on this error, declaring it to be a "puerile and false pronunciation" If the writer is correctly informed, it is never heard among good speakers in England The following are all or nearly all the words in which the e should be sounded aspen, chicken, hyphen, kitchen, jerken, latten, lichen, marten, mynchen, paten, patten, platen, rowen, wicken, and yewen. The e is also sounded when preceded by the liquids l, m, n, r, as in woolen, omen, linen, siren, &c , though fallen, stolen, and swollen omit the e in pronunciation With regard to Eden, bounden, heathen, mitten, sudden, and sloven, there is a diversity of usage among good speakers in this country, some suppressing, and some sounding, the e.

ON with O silent

§ 59. Many words ending in on preceded by c, ck, s, and t, omit the o in pronunciation, as in reckon (reck'n), bacon (bak'n), treason (treas'n), mutton (mutt'n), &c

ED with E silent

§ 60. The termination ed is usually shortened in pronunciation by dropping the sound of the e (as in loved (lov'd), aimed (aim'd), diffused (diffus'd), &c), unless this letter is preceded by d or t (as in amended, contented, &c), when its omission is organically impossible But in adverbs formed by adding ly, and in nouns formed by adding ness, to words ending in ed, the e of this termination is uniformly sounded, as in assuredly, confusedly, reputedly, amazedness, composedness, &c There are also some participial adjectives, and some adjectives not derived from verbs, in which the e is commonly sounded, as, aged, beloved, blessed, crabbed, cragged, crooked, crutched, cursed, cusped, dentced, dogged, hooked, jagged, learned, legged, naked, peaked, picked (sharp), ragged, rugged, stubbed, wicked, winged, wretched The e is also pronounced in the derivatives formed from such adjectives, as, learnedly, blessedness, but is generally omitted in the compounds, as, full-aged (-ājd), sheath-winged (-wingd) In poetry, the meter often requires us to pronounce ed as a distinct syllable, when it would not be so pronounced in prose In all cases where it should properly be sounded, its omission is a mark of great vulgarity

Note —In reading the Scriptures and Prayer book, some persons, chiefly among the clergy, make it a practice to pronounce the participial termination ed, in most cases in which it is not preceded by a vowel (as in believed, revealed), as a distinct syllable Thus, "Whom he did predestinate, them he also call ed, and whom he call-ed, them he also justifi*ed*, and whom he justifi*ed*, them he also glorifi*ed*" This usage was formerly a very prevalent one, but, at the present time, it is much more limited, and is commonly regarded as savoring of affectation or of an old-school education.

EL with E silent.

§ 61. As a general rule, the e is sounded in these terminations, as in gravel, level, vessel, chapel, &c. To omit the e in such cases, pronouncing level lev'l, chapel chap'l, &c., is generally regarded as a vulgarism The following are nearly or quite all the words of this kind in which the e is properly omitted, viz, barbel, betel, chattel, drazel, drivel, easel, grovel, hazel, mangel wurzel, mantel, mispickel, mussel, navel, ousel, ravel, rivel, scovel, shekel, shovel, shrivel, snivel, swingel, swivel, teasel, toggel, towsel, weasel, and, according to a few orthoepists, model.

CONSONANTS.

B.

§ 62. The sound represented by this letter (which is unmarked) is heard in the words barn, rob, labor, table, &c

Note —This sound is formed by the compression of vocalized breath, or voice, within the mouth, while the lips are shut and the back nostrils are closed by covering them with the soft palate When preceded by m, or followed by t, in the same syllable, b is generally silent, as in bomb, climb, tomb, debt, doubt, subtle, &c. Accumb, dithyramb, iambb, succumb, rhomb, rhumb, are said to be exceptions, yet, in this country, the first and the fourth of these words are commonly pronounced without sounding the b. B is also silent in bdellium.

C.

§ 63 C marked thus, Ç, ç (soft c), has the sound of s, as in cede, trace, acid, cypress, &c.

Note —It takes this sound whenever it occurs before e (even if silent), i, or y —See S, § 90

When the letters ce or ci are immediately preceded by an accented syllable, and are followed by a vowel in the next syllable, the c combines in pronunciation with the e or i to form the sound sh, as in ocean, social, saponaceous, &c. In some words, c alone has this sound, or, rather, the e or i is used twice, first combining with the c to represent the sound of sh, and then, in the same syllable, taking on its customary vowel sound, as in so-ci-al'-ty — See SH, § 95.

§ 64 C marked thus, €, ¢ (hard c), has the sound of k when it comes before a, o, u, l, or r, before k, s, or t final, and when it ends a word or a syllable, as in call, cot, cut, clot, crown, black, act, zinc, traffic, picture, flaccid, ethics —See K, § 78

§ 65. C has the sound of z in the words sacrifice, sice, suffice, and discern, and in their derivatives It is silent in the words czar, victuals, indict, and their derivatives, and also in the termination scle, as in muscle, corpuscle, &c

§ 66 Ch unmarked (English ch) has very nearly the sound of tsh, as in chalk, much, richer, speechless, &c

Note —The compound sound signified by this digraph is not precisely equivalent to that represented by tsh The ordinary sound of t is uttered with the tip of the tongue pressed against the gum of the upper front teeth The first element of ch is uttered with the upper flat surface of the tongue, near the tip, applied to the gum at a point higher up, just where a relaxation of the contact produces the configuration requisite for sounding sh, the second constituent of the compound The two elements are so closely blended in pronunciation that, like a diphthong, or compound vowel, they have the effect of only a single sound or beat upon the ear

When the letter t comes before u (=yoo) in an unaccented syllable, and is at the same time preceded by an accented syllable (as in nature), or when it is preceded by s or x in an accented syllable and is immediately followed by ia (=ya) or io (=yo) in an unaccented syllable (as in Christian, question, admixtion), both this letter and the y virtually following it are, by some speakers, preserved in their usual and appropriate sounds, thus, nature (nat'yoor), Christian (krist'-y an), question (kwest'yun), admixtion (ad mikst'yun), &c But by others they are suffered to sink into the easier and closely allied sound of ch in church, thus, nature (nā'choor), Christian, (kris'chan), question (kwes'chun), admixtion (ad miks'chun), &c In regard to the pronunciation of words ending in teous, when this termination is not under, but is immediately preceded by, the accent (as in bounteous), usage is far from being uniform, some calling it t-yus (as bount'yus), others reducing it to chus (as boun'chus), while others corrupt it into che us (as boun'che-us) but that mode which keeps both the t and the e in their customary sounds (as boun'te-us) is the most common, except in the single word righteous, which is properly pronounced rī'tyus, or rī'chus

Walker marked ch, when preceded by l or n, with the sound of simple sh, respelling filch filsh bench bensh, &c This is treated as an error by Smart and other leading orthoepists, who give to ch its ordinary compound sound in all words of this class

§ 67 Ch marked thus, Ch ch (French ch), has the sound of sh, as in chaise, marchioness, machine, &c —See SH, § 95

Note —Most words of this kind are derived from the French According to the same analogy, chivalry which comes from that language, would be pronounced shivalry, and not chivalry, and it is so marked by able orthoepists

§ 68 Ch marked thus, Ch, ch (Latin ch), has the sound of k, as in chorus, epoch, distich, &c This is the usual sound in words derived from the ancient languages, but cherub and charity, with their derivatives, are exceptions. Ch is always hard (like k) before l and r, as in chlorine, chrism

Note —The prefix arch, denoting chief, is pronounced ark in archangel and its derivatives, and in words from foreign languages in which the other component part is not separately current in English, as, architecture, archipelago, architrave, &c In all other cases, it is pronounced artch, as in archbishop, arch enemy, arch fiend, &c.

§ 69 Ch is silent in the word drachm (though not in drachma, drak'ma), and also in schism, yacht (yot), and their derivatives.

§ 70 The sound of d (unmarked), as in dale, sad, ride, tradesman &c

Note —The sound of this letter is formed by pressing the end of the tongue against the upper gums, and then forcing up vocalized breath, or voice, into the mouth, the soft palate being raised to prevent its escape through the nose

This is the regular and usual sound of d but when this letter follows a whispered or non-vocal consonant in the same syllable it uniformly takes the sound of t, as in hissed (hist). (See § 108) D is silent only in the words Wednesday and handkerchief

F

§ 71 The sound of f (unmarked), as in fame, leaf, definite, softly, &c

Note — This letter, which is never silent is uttered by applying the lower lip to the upper front teeth, and emitting the breath F has only this one sound, except in the single word of, in which it has the power of v. In the compounds hereof, thereof, and whereof, many speakers preserve the customary and regular sound of the f, but good usage allows it to be sounded as in the simple word.

G.

§ 72. G marked thus, G, g (g hard), has the sound of that letter in the word go, as in get, gave, give, begun, keg, sluggish, smuggle, &c.

NOTE.—This sound is produced by a compression of intonated breath, or voice, confined within the mouth by a contact of the root of the tongue with the posterior part of the palate, which is at the same time raised sufficiently to cover the back nostrils, or openings from the pharynx into the nose.

G is hard before a (except in the single word gaol and its derivatives), o, u, h, l, and r, as in gate, gore, gum, ghastly, glad, grain. It is sometimes, though not usually, hard before e, i, and y, as in get, give, gibbous, muggy This occurs chiefly in words from the Anglo Saxon, and in a very few from the Greek It is also, and always, hard at the end of words, and in the derivatives of such words, even when the g is doubled and followed by e, i, or y, as in crag, drug, fog, cragged, druggist, foggy

When a or i is preceded in the same syllable by the sound of g or of k, very many speakers, particularly in England, interpose a slight sound of e, as in card, kind, garden, guard, girl, guile, guise, sky Some persons affect the introduction of a full and distinct sound of long e, or of consonant y, in such cases, saying, kee-ard or k-yard, kee-ind or k-yind, skee ĭ or sk-yĭl, &c The practice of a very large portion, if not a majority, of the best speakers in the United States, and also of many educated persons in England, is to join the sound of the g or k to that of the a or i, without suffering any other sound to slip in between them.

§ 73. G marked thus, Ġ, & (g soft), has the compound sound of j, as in gem, rage, engine, caged, &c.—See § 77.

NOTE.—The letter g generally takes this sound when it comes before e, i, or y, but there are some exceptions (See the preceding section) G has also its soft sound before a in the single word gaol (now commonly spelt jail), and in its derivatives and compounds

§ 74. In a few words from the French, g retains the sound of zh, which it has before e and i in that language, as in rouge (roozh), mirage (mi-razh'), &c

G is silent before m and n final, and also when initial before n, as in phlegm, sign, gnat.

For the office which g performs in such words as longer, stronger, &c., see § 82

GH.

§ 75. This digraph (which is unmarked) is sounded, at the beginning of a word, like g hard, as in ghastly, ghost, gherkin, &c It is silent after the vowel i, as in high, sigh, weigh, and it is generally silent before t, as in bought, fraught, taught, &c. The words draught and laughter, where it has the sound of f, are exceptions In other cases, gh is generally pronounced like f, as in chough, cough, rough, tough, trough, enough, &c, but it sometimes has the sound of k, as in hough, lough, slough In the word hiccough, it is usually pronounced like p

Formerly this digraph had the sound of f much more frequently than it has at the present day Daughter, for instance, was often pronounced and sometimes spelt dafter, the gh having the Italian f sound On the other hand, rafter has been found with the spelling raughter Smollett gives thof for though, in representing the speech of the vulgar, and the poets of the Elizabethan period frequently used such rhymes as naught and oft, taught and aloft, &c.

H.

§ 76. This letter (which is unmarked) is a mere aspiration, or breathing, and represents no fixed configuration of the vocal organs.

NOTE.—It is an emission of unvocalized breath through whatever position of the mouth-organs is required by the succeeding element, the organs being always placed to form the next following letter before the h is pronounced Thus, in he, the tongue is put in a position to sound the e before the h is uttered, and similarly in hall, home, &c H differs, however, from a mere whispered vowel, in being an expiration of breath through the open glottis, whereas in whispering a vowel the glottis is almost closed by the approximation of the vocal chords

In the following words, heir, heiress, herb, herbage, honest, honor, honorable, hour, with their derivatives, and also in hostler (more properly spelt ostler), h is silent It is also marked as silent by most orthoepists in hospital, humor, and humble, with their derivatives There is, however, an increasing tendency to sound the h in these words H is silent after q initial, as in ghost, gherkin, &c, after r, as in rhyme, myrrh, &c., and when preceded by a vowel in the same syllable, as in ah, eh, oh, buhl, &c In many parts of England, the sound of this letter is almost always omitted where it ought to be uttered, and uttered where it ought to be omitted, as, 'ouse for house, happle for apple, &c This very gross and vulgar error is rarely, if ever, heard among natives of the United States.

J.

§ 77. This letter (which is unmarked) has very nearly the sound of dzh, being precisely the same as that of g soft, as in jar, jeer, joke, &c.—See § 73

NOTE.—The sound of j, though almost identical with that of dzh, differs from it as the sound of ch in chin differs from that of tsh (See § 66, NOTE) J is never silent In the word halleluyah, it has the sound of consonant y

In words in which d precedes a letter having regularly the sound of y, and occurring in an unaccented syllable, as in modulate (mod'u-late), soldier (sōld'-yer), the sound of j is very often substituted for the combined sounds of the d and y (thus, möj'oo-late, sōl'jer),—just as the sound of ch is substituted for the combined sounds of t and y in nature, question, righteous, &c (See § 66, NOTE) Smart remarks, "It is possible to preserve the pure sound of the t and d in nature and verdure, yet nothing is more certain than that they are not preserved pure by the best and most careful speakers."

K.

§ 78. This letter (which is unmarked) has one uniform sound, as heard in keep, king, kitchen, &c, and is precisely equivalent to c hard.—See § 64

NOTE.—The sound represented by this letter differs from that of g in go (hard g) only in being a whispered and not a vocal utterance, the organs are placed in the same position for forming both sounds Before n, in the same syllable, k is silent, as in knack, knell, knit, know, &c. It is also silent after c, as in back, barrack, &c. In regard to the pronunciation sometimes given to such words as kind, sky, &c., see § 72, NOTE.

NOTE.—This letter has only one sound, which consists of an efflux of vocalised breath, or voice, over the sides of the tongue, while its tip is pressed against the gums of the upper front teeth. L is silent in many words, especially before a final consonant, as in almond, malmsey, palmer, alms, calm, walk, half, could, would, should, &c.

M.

§ 80. The sound of m (unmarked), as heard in make, aim, clamor, armed, &c.

NOTE.—This letter has one uniform sound, produced by closing the lips, and letting the voice issue through the nose. It is silent when it precedes n in the same syllable, as in mnemonics.

N.

§ 81. The sound of n (unmarked), as heard in nail, ten, panel, entry, &c.

NOTE.—In the production of this sound, the tip of the tongue is pressed against the upper gums, as for d, but the voice, instead of being confined within the mouth, is suffered to escape uninterruptedly through the nose, the nasal passages being uncovered for that purpose

When final after l or m, n is uniformly silent, as in kiln, condemn, solemn, hymn, hmn, &c, but it is generally sounded in the derivatives formed from such words by adding to them a termination beginning with a vowel, as in condemnatory, solemnize, hymnic, limner, &c. In the present participles of verbs ending in mn, as contemn, hymn, &c., the n, though often unpronounced, is more properly sounded, as, contemning, hymning, &c.

§ 82. The sound of n as heard in linger, link, uncle, &c. (marked N, ŋ).

NOTE.—This is essentially the same sound as that represented by ng, but its length varies greatly according as it is followed by a whispered or a vocal consonant When it is followed in the same syllable by the sound of k, as in link, it is cut so short by the instantaneous and perfect closure of the organs which form this pure mute as to add almost nothing to the length of the syllable. It is therefore undesirable to respell words ending in nk by the use of ng, and, in this volume, this is not done, a diacritical mark being placed below the n instead, as a sufficient indication of the true quality and quantity of the sound But when this sound of n is followed by that of g in a separate syllable, as in the primitive words anger, finger, conger, hunger, it is long and sonorous, and increases the duration of the syllable utterance very perceptibly As a general rule, the change of n into ŋ takes place only before g and k (or before the equivalents of k,—c, q, and x = ks) It takes place before k or its equivalents when any one of these letters follows n in an accented or unaccented syllable, as in link, cinque, minx, bethink', adunque', pharynx, and before g or k, or an equivalent of k, when any one of these letters begins an unaccented syllable, and the n ends a preceding accented one, as in con'cord, con'gress, un'cle, &c Penguin and a few other words are exceptions, also words beginning with the prefixes in, non, quinque, and un, as, in'come, non'conformity, quin'quevalve, un'compound'ed, &c. It is to be observed that, if the n ends an unaccented syllable, and the g or k begins an accented one, the n invariably retains its regular sound as in con cord'ant, con gres'sional, &c

It is also to be observed that in most derivative words, like hanger, singer, wronger (from hang, sung, and wrong), the g is not sounded, but unites with the n to represent the sound which in the primitives just cited is represented by n alone But in the comparative and superlative degrees of the three following words, viz, long, strong, and young, and also in the words diphthongal and triphthongal (from diphthong and triphthong), the g is always, though very irregularly, pronounced, taking its hard sound, as in go, thus, long'ger, strong'ger, &c. It is further to be observed that there is a small class of words in which the n has its ordinary sound, as in nail, and the g its soft sound, as in gem. Of this class, the words danger, stranger, ginger, and plunger are examples.

§ 83 The sound of ng (unmarked), as in sing, singer, singly, &c.

NOTE.—This is a simple, elementary sound, and is not (as might be supposed) a compound sound made up of the sound of n in conjunction with that of g. In forming ng, the tongue is placed in the same position as for forming g, the nostrils, however, are not completely closed, but yet so much so as to produce a marked resonance (somewhat similar to the sound of n), which may be continued to any length, as in sing, bring, &c.—See § 82.

P.

§ 84. The sound of p (unmarked), as heard in pay, ape, paper, aptly, &c

NOTE.—The position of the organs necessary for forming this sound is the same as for b, but the sound itself differs from that of b in being an utterance of the breath instead of the voice

P has but one sound, it is silent when initial before n, s, and t, as in pneumatics, psalm, phaw, ptarmigan It is also silent or very indistinct when it occurs between m and t in the same syllable, as in tempt, exempt, &c, but when preceded by m in the same syllable and followed by t or by l in the next syllable, it is more properly sounded, as in temp-tation, exemption, redemption, consumptive, sumptuous, bumpkin, pumpkin, &c., though, in colloquial utterance, it is very often suppressed in words of this class. It is also mute in the following words, and in their derivatives, viz., raspberry, receipt, sempstress, accompt, and corps.

PH

§ 85 This digraph (which is unmarked) occurs chiefly in words of Greek derivation, and has usually the sound of f, as in phantom, sylph, philosophy, &c In Stephen it has the sound of v and, according to most orthoepists, it has the same sound in nephew (nev'ew), though in this country it has commonly its regular sound of f in that word

Before th initial, ph is silent, as in phthisis, it is also silent in apophthegm In diphthong, triphthong, ophthalmy, naphtha, and other allied words, together with their derivatives, the ph is often sounded as p, or the h may be regarded as silent

Q.

§ 86. Q is followed in all cases by u, and these two letters, taken together, have usually the sound of kw, as in queen (kween), conquest (kongk'west), &c.

In a few words derived from the French, qu is sounded like k, as in coquette, quadrille, &c. It has the same sound in the common termination que, as in antique, oblique, burlesque, &c.

R.

§ 87. This letter (which is unmarked) may be viewed under three aspects: —

(1.) R as in rip, trip, carol, &c. (sometimes called rough, trilled, dental, or initial r).

In forming this sound, the tongue assumes nearly the same position as for d, but the voice, instead of being confined within the mouth, is suffered to flow freely over the tip of the tongue, producing a very slightly trilled and peculiarly liquid sound, closely resembling that of z in the mode of its formation, but not partaking of its harsh, buzzing quality, the difference between the two sounds, in this respect, resulting from the fact that the tip of the tongue is approximated more closely to the upper gum for z than for r. R is sometimes strongly trilled or rolled by a forcible expulsion of the voice, but in customary speech, it is very gently pronounced, and any marked vibration of the tongue should be carefully avoided as a pedantic affectation. The sound here described is heard in English in the two following cases. 1. When r is not preceded by a vowel, as in ream, dream, prompt, spring. 2. When it stands between two vowels of which the first is short, as in baron, merit, spirit, florid. Often the r is doubled in the written word, as in barren, merry, torrid, but, in these cases, only one r is heard in the pronunciation, provided the preceding vowel is short. — See § 109.

(2.) R as in far, form, terse, surge, &c. (sometimes called smooth, palatal, guttural, obscure, or final r).

By most orthoepists at the present day, the letter r, when it occurs before any consonant, or when final, is regarded as a distinct element from the last, and as formed by a slight vibration of the back part, or root, of the tongue against the extremity of the soft palate. Many writers, however, do not admit any such distinction in the sound of r, maintaining that the value of the letter (apart from the obscure vowel element described in No. 3) is uniform in all situations.

(3.) R, connected with a guttural vowel sound, as heard in such words as fare, mere, ire, ore, cure, poor, our, &c. Here the character r represents two sounds, viz., an obscure vowel sound resembling that of u in urge, and a smooth or palatal r, so that the above words are pronounced fâur (see § 4), mēur, iur, &c.

§ 88. In the pronunciation of accurate speakers, r is never silent, but when it occurs after a long vowel or a diphthong in the same syllable, as in here, fur, murmur, our, mire, &c., it is commonly and entirely suppressed, both in the United States and the south of England. In the northern counties of England, and in Scotland and Ireland, with equal impropriety, it is, when so situated, always strongly trilled.

§ 89. In English usage, when the letter r is preceded in an accented syllable by a long vowel or a diphthong, and is followed by a vowel in the next syllable, it uniformly represents both the palatal, or smooth, and the dental, or trilled, sound of this letter, as in hero, iris, glory, lurid, pronounced hē'ro, ir'ris, glōr'ry, lur'rid. In the United States, this double power of the letter r is chiefly, though not invariably, restricted to the derivatives of words ending in r or re preceded by a long vowel or a diphthong, as in poorer (poor'rer), from poor, boring (bōr'ring), from bore, airy (âr'ry), from air, peerage (peer'rage), from peer, wiry (wīr'ry), from wire, securing (secūr'ring), from secure, but, on the other hand, we say he'ro, i'ris, glo'ry, lu'rid, &c., because these words are not derived from any other words in the language. In Scotland, however, the universal practice is to join the r in all cases to the following vowel, or, in other words, to give it only its dental or trilled sound, thus, pee'rage and he'ro, wi'ry and i'ris, bō'ring and glō'ry, secū'ring and lū'rid, &c.

It is to be observed that those orthoepists who maintain that r has one invariable sound, assert that the only peculiarity in the English pronunciation of such words as hero, iris, &c., and in the English and American pronunciation of such words as poorer, boring, &c., consists in the interposition between the r and the preceding vowel of an obscure vowel sound like that of u in urge, which obscure sound is omitted by the Scotch.

§ 90. S unmarked has its regular sharp or hissing sound, as in same, yes, massy, resting, &c.

Note. — This sound is an utterance of unvocal breath forced between the tip of the tongue and the upper gum, the tongue being placed in the proper position for sounding t and d. S always has this sound at the beginning, and frequently in the middle and at the end, of words. — See § 108.

§ 91. S, when marked thus, S̈, s̈, has the buzzing sound of z in zeal, as in has, amuse, rosy, &c. — See § 108.

Note. — There has been much diversity among orthoepists as to the sound of s in words commencing in dis, as disarm, disburse, &c. Walker laid down this rule: "It [s] ought always to be pronounced like z when unaccented, and followed by an accented flat mute [b, d, g hard, v], a liquid [l, m, n, r], or a vowel." Hence he gave pronunciations like the following: disbud, dizbud; disedify, dizedify; disjoin, dizjoin; dislike, dizlike; dislodge, dizlodge, &c. Scarcely any subsequent orthoëpist has gone so far. Webster's Dictionary gives s the sound of z in the following words only, viz., disarm, disaster, discern, disease, disheir, dishonest, dishonor, dismal, disown, dissolve. Perry and Knowles give the z sound even in fewer words. Ogilvie, Craig, and Wright agree almost to a word with Webster. Jameson, Smart, Worcester, Bong, and Cooley go much further, but, with one or two exceptions, the orthoëpists, as a body, have condemned the extent to which Walker has gone in this respect.

In regard to the pronunciation of gentile nouns and adjectives ending in ese, as Chinese, Japanese, Portuguese, &c., the orthoëpists are not agreed, and common usage is not settled. Many speakers, especially in this country, give the s in this termination its hissing sound, as in yes, while others — including most of the orthoëpists — give it the buzzing sound of z in zeal.

There are a few verbs ending in se, which are also used as nouns or adjectives. To distinguish between them, the s is vocalized in the verb, and whispered in the noun or adjective, as close, a., and cloze, v., house, n., and houze, v., use, n., and uze, v., diffuse, a., and diffuze, v.

§ 92. When the letter s, having regularly its sharp or hissing sound, follows a liquid or another s, and precedes a letter having the sound of consonant y, as i in reversion, mansion, passion, and, in a few cases, when it precedes ū (=yoo), as in sure, sugar, censure, sensual, the sounds represented by these letters are exchanged for that of the simple but very similar element represented by sh. Thus the examples just given are actually pronounced re-ver'shun, man'shun, pash'un, shoor, shōog'ar, cen'shoor, sen'shoo-al, though the theoretical pronunciation would be re-vers'yun, mans'yun, pāss'yun, s-yoor, s-yōog'ar, cens'yoor, sens'yoo-al. Sheridan gave the same sound to the sy implied in su, in all cases in which this combination occurs, even when under the accent, saying shoo preme' for sū preme', shoo'i-cide for sū'i-cide, &c., and for this he has been strongly condemned by subsequent orthoepists. But although this pronunciation is now very rarely heard, and that only among provincial, affected, or illiterate speakers, it was formerly in vogue among many of the most cultivated and fashionable people in England from the time of the Elizabethan writers down to that of Garrick.

In a few words, s alone takes the sound of sh, as in nausea, Asiatic, or rather the e or z, in such cases, does double duty, uniting with the s to signify the sound of sh, and, at the same time, retaining its usual vowel character.

§ 93. When s is preceded by a vowel in an accented syllable, and is followed by a vowel having regularly or theoretically the sound of consonant y, these two letters are commonly pronounced like zh, as in adhesion, revision, explosion, confusion, pleasure, visual, usury, &c. (See § 107.) So also in scission, abscission, rescission, though the s is not preceded by a vowel in the accented syllable.

§ 94. S is silent in the words aisle, isle, island, demesne, puisne, viscount, and generally at the end of French words adopted into English, as chamois, corps, vis-a-vis, &c.

SH.

§ 95. This digraph (which is unmarked) represents the simple sound heard in shelf, flesh, usher, &c.

Note. — This element is formed by a partial contact of the upper surface of the tongue, near the tip, with that side of the arch or dome of the palate which is just above the gums of the front teeth, and by an effusion of unvocal breath through the narrow aperture left for its escape. Organically considered, the sound is intermediate between those of s and consonant y; genetically considered, it has been evolved from the combination of these two sounds, which, in rapid utterance, do not easily maintain their distinct character. Thus, if we pronounce the word special in three syllables, spes'y-al, and then try to reduce it to two, we shall find that it is difficult to articulate the c (=s) and the i (=y) by one continuous effort of the organs, and that the intermediate sh is naturally substituted as an easier and a closely allied sound. So with version, mission, sure, &c. In motion, and other words ending in tion not preceded by s or by x, we may suppose the t to have been originally sounded like s, as in words of the same class in French, or the process of development may have been, first, mō'ti-on (with the t kept pure), then mōt'yun, next mōt'shun or mo'chun (see § 68), and finally, by sinking the t, mo'shun.

Sh is never silent. It is expressed by, 1. C, as in o-ce-an'ic, e-ma-ci-a'tion. 2. By s, as in nau'se-ate, A-si-at'ic. 3. By t, as in ne-go-ti-a'tion. 4. By cc, as in o'cean. 5. By ci, as in so'cial. 6. By se, as in nau'seous. 7. By si, as in ten'sion. 8. By ti as in cap'tious. 9. By the si implied in xi (=ksi), as in noxious. 10. By the sy implied in su (=*sy*oo), as in men-su-ra'tion (men-shoo-ra'shun). 11. By the sy implied in xu (=ksyoo), as in lux'u-ry (luk'shoo-ry). 12. By ch, as in chaise, char'la-tan, ma-chine'. 13. By chs, as in fu'chsia. 14. By sc, as in con-sci-en'tious. 15. By sch, as in schism. 16. By sci, as in sci'ence. — See §§ 63, 92, 97, 104.

In some words, particularly those ending in ciate and tiate, some orthoëpists and speakers pronounce the vowel distinctly after the c or t sounded as sh: as, enunciate (e-nūn'shi-ate), expatiate (eks-pā'shi-ate), &c.; others pronounce it with a slight sound, as of a very brief or half suppressed e, represented in the Dictionaries of Smart and Cooley by an apostrophe, thus enunciate (e-nūn'sh'ate), expatiate (eks-pā'sh'ate), &c.; others again, as Sheridan, Perry, and Dr. Webster, considering it an error to use the vowel twice, pronounce these terminations, and others like them, in one syllable: as, enunciate (e-nūn'shate), expatiate (eks-pā'shate), &c. In this Dictionary, however, these terminations are given in two syllables (-shi-ate), in accordance with what is believed to be the best and most general usage; but a reference to the present section is generally appended to words of this class, that the inquirer may not be left in ignorance of the fact that there is a want of uniformity in their pronunciation.

§ 96. The sound of t (unmarked) as heard in tone, note, noted, assets, &c.

Note. — This sound differs from that of d (see § 70) only in being a whispered and not a vocal utterance, that is to say, the position or configuration of the articulating organs is the same in both cases, but for d the breath confined within the mouth by a close contact of the fore part of the tongue with the upper gum, is vocalized and rendered audible in a sort of murmur heard before the organs separate, while for t it is kept pure or unvocal, and can not therefore be heard till the contact is forcibly broken.

T is silent in the terminations ten and tle after s, as in fasten, listen, often, castle, grastle, thrastle, &c. It is also silent in the words chestnut, Christmas, hostler or ostler, mistletoe, and mortgage.

§ 97. When t precedes any one of the diphthongs ia, ie, and io, and, at the same time, follows an accented syllable not ending in s or x, it assumes, in some words, the sound of sh, as in negotiation, but, in most cases, the compound sound resulting from the coalescence of t and i is exchanged for that of sh, as in patient, station, partial, &c. When s or x precedes the t, this letter and the i following it either preserve their own sounds pure, or exchange them for the sound of ch in chin, as in question (kwest'yun or kwes'chun), mixtion (mikst'yun or miks'chun), &c. — See § 66, NOTE, and § 95.

TH

§ 98 Th unmarked has its sharp or whispered sound, as in thing, breath, author, athlete, &c.

NOTE — This is the sound made in lisping It is produced by putting the point of the tongue between the teeth, or by placing it against the back of the upper front teeth, and forcing out unintonated breath

Th has this sound generally at the beginning, and at the end, of words, but there are some exceptions

§ 99 Th marked thus, Th, th, has its soft, flat, or vocal sound, as in thine, then, with, mother, writhed, &c.

NOTE — This sound differs from the foregoing only in being an utterance of voice instead of simple breath It occurs chiefly between two vowels in words purely English, as in feather, whither, heathen, also at the end of the verbs mouth, bequeath, and smooth, and when followed by a final e mute, as in breathe, clothe, &c

Nouns which, in the singular, end in th sharp, usually preserve the same sound in the plural, as death, deaths sabbath, sabbaths, &c , but in the plurals of the following seven words the th is vocal, viz , bath, cloth, lath, mouth, oath, path, and wreath, as baths, cloths, laths, paths &c Some pronounce truths, in the plural, with the vocal sound (truths), but this is sanctioned by no orthoepist

Although th in with has its vocal sound, yet in the compounds herewith, therewith, and wherewith, it is, according to the orthoepists, pronounced with its sharp or whispered sound Good usage, however, allows it to retain in the compound the same sound that it has in the simple word

§ 100 Th has the sound of t in phthisic (tiz'ik), thyme (tim), and their derivatives, and also in the proper names Thomas (tom'as) and Thames (temz). This is also its sound in all modern European languages except the Greek In asthma and isthmus, it is said by the orthoepists to have the same sound, but the great majority of speakers, in the United States at least, entirely suppress the th, pronouncing the former word ăz'ma or ăs'ma, and the latter Is'mus or Iz'mus. — See § 108

V.

§ 101. The sound of v (unmarked), as in vane, leave, civil, &c

NOTE — This sound differs from that of f only in being an utterance of the voice instead of the breath, the organs assuming precisely the same position for both sounds

I is never silent, except in sennight (sen'nit), which is also written sennight, and, according to some orthoepists, in the word fuchsemonth, colloquially pronounced fuel'muth.

W.

§ 102 At the beginning of a word or of a syllable, as wet, worse, inward, this letter (which is unmarked) is a consonant, formed from, and nearly resembling, the vowel o͞o, but requiring for its utterance a closer position, or greater contraction, of the labial aperture, and this compression of the lips changes the quality of the sound, giving it a buzzing and articulative, instead of a smooth and purely vocal, character.

NOTE — Some writers, however, maintain that the sound is merely that of a brief oo, in other words, that it is no consonant at all, but a simple experiment will serve to show the incorrectness of this view If w is the same as oo, the word wo͞o must be equivalent to oo pronounced twice in succession, but o͞o o͞o is evidently a word of two syllables, and wo͞o, as universally pronounced, is confessedly a monosyllable Another consideration will help to establish the consonantal nature of w Like the other consonants, it is capable of stopping or shutting a vowel, that is, of causing it to assume its regular short sound, as in the cockney pronunciation of very as vĕ'wy, of horrid as hŏ'wid, &c

After a vowel in the same syllable, w is generally silent, as in glo͞w, thro͞wn, &c , though sometimes significant, as in figure With e it unites to form a diphthong, which is generally sounded like long u, as in dew, few, new, but it is sounded like o͞o, or like u in rude, if the letter r stands before it, as in crew, shrew, &c It is often joined with a preceding o to represent the diphthongal sound otherwise expressed by ou, as in brow, cow, town, &c — See § 69

W is always silent before r in the same syllable, as in wring (ring), wrote (rōt), also in the words answer (an'ser), sword (sōrd), toward (to'ard), and two (too)

It is often represented by u occurring before another vowel in the same syllable, as in quail, query, languid, assuage, &c.

WH.

§ 103 The true sound of these letters is in the reverse order, viz , hw, as they were written by the Anglo-Saxons, e g , whet is pronounced hwet The h is here a free emission of breath through the position taken by the lips in the formation of w (See § 76) Many recent phonologists, however, contend that the combination wh represents a simple whisper of the ordinary w, to which it stands in the same relation as any surd consonant does to its corresponding sonant. Those who hold this opinion not only wrongly apprehend and describe their own pronunciation, but they overlook the fact that as a closer approximation of the lips in pronouncing oo-et changes the sound to wet, so hoo-et in like manner gives rise to whet, and they forget that all words of this class originally began with an aspiration, as their etymological history clearly shows. Thus what is from the A-S hwæt, O Sax huat, Icel hvattr, &c Compare also Scot. quhite and Eng white, Lat quid and Eng. what. In who, whole, whoop, whore, and their derivatives, the w is silent.

X.

§ 104. This letter has two sounds, viz , its regular sharp sound (unmarked) like ks, as in expect, and its soft or flat sound (marked X, x) like gz, as in exist.

NOTE — This latter sound usually occurs when the syllable which immediately follows the x begins with an accented vowel, as in auxiliary, exert, exalt, luxurious, and sometimes also in the derivatives of such words, even though the x is under the accent, as in exemplary, exhalation, &c.

In anxious, noxious, luxury, and a few other words, the s which is the second element of the x, and the following i or the first element of the following u, instead of retaining their usual sound of y, are generally exchanged for the sound of sh, thus ank'shus, nok'shus, luk'shoo-ry, &c

At the beginning of words, x has the sound of z, as in xanthic (zan'-), xebec (ze'-), xylography (zī-), &c.

§ 105 The sound of y (unmarked), as in yawn, year, young, beyond, &c.

NOTE — This sound — which is heard in English only at the beginning of a word or a syllable — is formed from the vowel e by a closer approximation of the tongue to the roof of the mouth, which destroys the pure vocality of the e. As w is often confounded with oo, so y is often confounded with ē, but it may be proved to be a distinct sound by an experiment on the word ye similar to that by which w was shown to be distinct from oo — See § 102

In the middle or at the end of a syllable, y is a vowel, and has precisely the sound that i would have in the same situation — See §§ 15, 16, 35, 48, 54, &c

I is often represented by i, when this letter occurs in an unaccented syllable before another vowel, and, at the same time, follows an accented syllable, as in familiar, minion, pontiard, &c.

Z.

§ 106. The regular and leading sound of this letter (which is unmarked) is heard in zone, maze, hazy, frozen, &c It is the vocal or sonant form of s (See § 90) In a few words it takes the sound of zh, as in seizure (sē'zhoor) &c, (See § 107) In rendezvous it is silent

ZH.

§ 107. This sound is the vocal correspondent of sh, and is uttered with the organs in precisely the same position.

NOTE — It has arisen, in all English words, from an attempt to pronounce the sound of z in maze (see § 106) and that of consonant y (see § 105) in immediate succession On account of the vicinity of the contacts represented by zh and y, the effort to do so causes the tongue to assume the position requisite for sounding zh, or nearly so, and hence zh was naturally substituted as being a very similar sound of easier utterance Thus, fusion may be supposed to have been originally pronounced fūz'yun, and then fu'zhun, grazier, originally grā'zyer, and then grā'zher — See § 95

The combination zh is used in works on pronunciation to indicate the sound here described, on account of the relationship of this sound to that commonly expressed by the digraph sh But the two letters zh never come together in the proper orthography of any English word The sound for which they stand is represented by z (when the z occurs in, or is immediately preceded by, an accented syllable, and the z is followed by another vowel, and occurs in an unaccented syllable, as in glazier), by the zy implied in zu (=zyoo), as in azure by s in symposium, &c , by s in certain situations (see § 93), by sti in the single word transition, as sometimes pronounced, and by g in one or two words adopted from the French, as rouge.

ASSIMILATION OF CONSONANTS

§ 108. When a whispered and a vocal consonant come together in the same syllable, it is generally very difficult, in fluent pronunciation, to preserve each in its regular and appropriate sound Hence it frequently becomes necessary to change the character of the one or of the other, in order to make the combination readily pronounceable. This is generally done, in English, by assimilating the sound of the second consonant, whether whispered or vocal, to that of the first Thus, in chimney, the vocal consonant z assumes the sound of its whispered correspondent s, in order to unite with the whispered t On the other hand, the s in sends is vocalized, or assumes the sound of z, for the sake of corresponding with the vocal d Sometimes, though rarely, the sound of the first consonant is assimilated to that of the second, as in spasm (spazm)

This affinity between these two classes of consonants is an important fact, and one which needs to be familiarly known For there are four very common inflectional terminations which invariably come under its influence, viz., 1 Possessive forms in s, as maid's (maidz), 2 Plurals in s, as tubs (tubz), groves (grōvz), 3 S in the third person singular of verbs, as loads (loadz), smooths (smoothz), 4 Preterits and participles in d preceded by e mute, as in dashed (dasht), engulfed (ingulft)

It is necessary to observe that there are a few words ending in dth, as breadth, hundredth, &c , where the aspirate th is not assimilated to the vocal d; and also that, after ng, and the liquids l, m, n, r, — all of which are vocal consonants, — a whispered consonant can be pronounced without difficulty, and actually is pronounced, as in melt, terse, tempt (temt), fence, strength, &c.

DUPLICATION OF CONSONANTS

§ 109 In many words, a consonant is doubled between two vowels, yet, in such cases, no more than one articulation is ever used in speaking. In banner, for example, we close the organs but once between the first and second syllables, nor is it possible to use both of the letters n without pronouncing ban, then intermitting the voice entirely, opening the organs, and closing them a second time Hence, in all cases, when the same consonant is written twice between vowels, as in banner, robbing, madden, letter, horrid, one of them only is represented by an articulation of the organs, and the only reason for repeating the consonant is to indicate the fact that the preceding vowel has its short sound.

But although only one articulation is ever used, or, in fluent speech, possibly can be used, where a consonant is written twice, yet in some words the articulation is dwelt upon for an appreciable space of time, producing an apparent duplication of the sound. This effect takes place in many derived words in which the primitive ends or begins with the same letter as that with which a superadded suffix or prefix of English origin respectively begins or ends, as in soulless, foully, keenness, misstep, outtravel, unnatural. The same effect takes place in most compound words, in which the second part begins with the same sound as that with which the first part ends, as in post-town, head-dress, half-filled. -- See § 127.

ACCENT.

§ 110. Accent is a particular stress or effort of voice upon certain syllables of words, which distinguishes them from the others by a greater distinctness and loudness of pronunciation Accent is of two kinds, primary, as in in-tend', where the full force of the voice is on the last syllable, and secondary, as in su'per-in-tend', where the first syllable is distinguished by a stress greater than that laid on the second and third syllables, though less than that laid on the last In some words there are two secondary or subordinate accents, as in in-com'pre hen'si bil'i-ty

NOTE — (1) The general tendency of accent, whether primary or secondary, is to shorten all vowels but u, when further back than the penultimate syllable, as in ten'ement, nec'essariness, an'atom'ical, person'ific'ation, &c , but we say in'bricate, and not inb'ricate, truculency, and not truc'ulency su'perabun'dant, and not sup'erabun'dant, &c This tendency generally fails, if the accented syllable is followed by two unaccented vowels, as in pe'ri-od, ma'm-ac or by two vowels of which the former only is unaccented, as in de'ri-a'tion, o'ri en'tal

(2) The primary and secondary accents are, in certain cases, so nearly equal that we interchange them freely, "making," as Walker remarks, "the secondary principal and the principal secondary" He specifies violin, reprieve, privateer, artisan, courtesan, charlatan, and might have added ambuscade, cavalcade, caricature, etiquette, reverie, confidante, governante, invalid, n , parachute, and others Nearly all of these, except the first three, have now (according to able orthoepists) transferred the primary accent from the last to the first syllable, as in artisan, &c , under the operation of a principle which is stated in § 117

(3) Many in this country give a marked secondary accent in certain words which properly have but one accent, and that on a pre antepenultimate syllable, as in ter'ri tō'ry, diffi cŭl'ty, cir'cum stăn'ces, in'ter ĕst'ing, &c This droning fault may be corrected by giving the accented syllable a sharp percussion, which carries the voice lightly through the rest of the word It is also a vulgar American custom, in many words having an unaccented initial syllable followed by an accented one, to lay a nearly equal stress of voice on both as in ĕx'act'ly, ĕl'egant'ic, ĭn'ĭt'ial, pŏl'ĭt'ical, prĕ'cĭs'ely, sĭt'u'ation, stŭp'endous These absurd and glaring errors are always extremely offensive to Englishmen Dickens, in his "Martin Chuzzlewit," ridicules them repeatedly "Perhaps," — he makes one of his characters say, — "perhaps there ain't no such loc'a'tion in the ter'ri-to'ry of the great U'nited States" It should be added, however, that, on their part, many English people go to the opposite extreme of so hurrying or slurring over unaccented syllables as often to rob them of much of the very small proportionate force which properly belongs to them

DIVIDED USAGE

§ 111 In quite a large number of words, there is a diversity of practice among good speakers as to the place of the primary accent This arises mainly from a conflict between certain great principles which affect the seat of the accent A few of these will now be mentioned, with a view to account for this diversity It is all that can be done in a brief sketch like this

§ 112 FIRST PRINCIPLE — Derivatives take for a time, if not permanently, the accent of the original words from which they are formed, as resolv'e, from resol'vo, aspect' (Shakespeare, Milton), from aspectus, Hindostan'ee, from Hindostan', &c. So also words derived from other English words by adding one or more syllables to their beginning or end, as within', from in, improp'er, from prop'er, pol'iteness, from pol'ite, pleas'antly, from pleas'ant, serv'iceable, from serv'ice, re adjust'ment, from adjust', &c.

§ 113 SECOND PRINCIPLE — Ease of utterance has some influence in deciding the place of the accent Ac'ceptable, rec'eptacle, and u'tensil, fashionable in the days of Walker, have now taken the easier accentuation of accept'able, recept'acle, and uten'sil Dis'crepant and dis'crepancy are marked discrep'ant and discrep'ancy by Richardson, Boag, Craig, Wright, Clarke, and others Sub'altern (instead of Walker's sub'altern) is the accentuation of Richardson, Knowles, Barclay, Craig, Clarke, and many more Dyspep'sy has taken the place of dys'pepsy in the marking of Webster, Smart, Cull, Wright, Clarke, Cooley, &c , and is now the prevailing accentuation On the same ground, ances'tral is preferred to an'cestral by Jameson, Webster, Boag, Clarke, and Cull, in conformity with campes'tral and other similar words Confes'sor, like profes'sor, has superseded con'fessor in this country, and has the support of Perry, Ash, Rees, Barclay, Boag, Clarke, Cull, Webster, and Worcester Rem'edīless, from the difficulty of the sound, has been changed in this country into remed'iless, as sanctioned by Perry, Ash, Rees, Fulton and Knight, and Webster Con'sistory has given way to consist'ory in the marking of Knowles, Barclay, Reid, Brande, Craig, Boag, Clarke, Cooley, and others In like manner, ac'cessary and ac'cessory (as marked in most English Dictionaries) are commonly pronounced in this country acces'sary and acces'sory, as recommended by Bailey and Ash These may serve as instances of the application of this principle It is an important one in its place, and, though it may give rise for a time to a diversity of pronunciation (since some will cling to that which is older and harder), changes of this kind, which promote ease of utterance, will finally prevail.

DISSYLLABLES.

§ 114. THIRD PRINCIPLE. — In words of two syllables, there is a tendency (though with numerous exceptions) to accent the former or penultimate syllable, as in a'gue, bar'on, com'mon, dis'cord, &c.

NOTE — (1) This tendency meets with a powerful counteraction in Principle No 1, viz , that of derivatives retaining the accent of their primitives, as in amuse', deter', offend', &c It is natural, in such formatives, to place the accent on the radical part of the word, and hence some hundreds of our dissyllables, especially verbs and adverbs, have their accent on the last syllable

(2) Still, there is a constant struggle (especially among the common people, who are unacquainted with the derivation of words) to draw back the accent to the first syllable Here arises another conflict, which produces a diversity of accent, and the common people, being a majority, are, on the whole, slowly gaining upon those who are tenacious of Principle No 1. Hence con'nate and in'nate (instead of connate' and innate') are generally prevalent in this country, and are now sanctioned by Reid, Boag, Craig, and others Al'cove (for alcove') is more common among us, and it is so marked by recent English orthoepists, Boag, Craig, Cull, and others Con'tents (for contents') has become the general usage of this country, as sanctioned by Cull, Clarke, Webster, and Worcester Re'tail (for retail') is now the marking of a majority of the orthoepists De'tail (for detail') is less prevalent, but is sanctioned by Smart, Clarke, Cull, Cooley, &c Pro'lix and pre'text (for prolix' and pretext') are widely prevalent (especially the former), and are authorized by some recent lexicographers Bom'bast (for bombast') is the accentuation of Walker, Barclay, Richardson, Cull, and Webster, it is admitted by Worcester, and is extensively used in this country Bu'reau (for bureau') was admitted by Dr Webster, and is very generally applied to the article of furniture, while bureau' is sometimes used in reference to a department of the government Ac'cess (for access') is authorized by a number of orthoepists, and especially, among the later ones, by Knowles, Boag, Wright, Clarke, and Cull * *

(3) No orthoepist has given any sanction, it is believed, to ro'mance and fi'nance (for romance' and finance'), or to re'search and re'source (for research' and resource'), though these pronunciations are not infrequently heard in America The two last ought especially to be discountenanced, for search and source are English words, and should therefore remain (as they were from the first) the chief objects of thought.

§ 115 We have about eighty cases among our dissyllables in which the same word is used for a verb on the one hand, and a noun or an adjective on the other To distinguish between them, we accent the nouns and the adjectives on the first syllable, and the verbs on the last, as, a con'vert, to convert' a con'tract, to contract', &c It is unnecessary to give the list in full, since the accent of nearly all these words has been long settled by general usage

NOTE — There are a few cases of divided use in nouns, which will sooner or later be made to conform to the general rule For example, usage will probably soon fix permanently on per'fect for the adjective, and perfect' for the verb per'mit for the noun, and permit' for the verb pro'duct for the noun, and product' for the verb per'fume for the noun and perfume' for the verb, pro'ceeds for the noun, and proceed' for the verb, de'tail for the noun, and detail' for the verb, in'crease for the noun, and increase' for the verb re'tail for the noun, and retail' for the verb, sur'vey for the noun, and survey' for the verb

There is a tendency among many to accent the first syllable of the noun ally, allies, and although without sanction as yet from a single orthoepist it would not be surprising if this tendency should prevail on the ground stated above, making the noun al'ly, al'lies, and the verb ally' The noun cement has been extensively pronounced cem'ent, as distinguished from the verb to cement' but Smart thinks this will not finally prevail, and the tendency does certainly now seem to be toward cement' for the noun as well as the verb

§ 116 We have a few dissyllables which are at once nouns and adjectives These are distinguished by accenting the nouns on the first syllable, and the adjectives on the last

NOUNS	ADJECTIVES.
Au'gust, the month	August', noble
Com'pact, an engagement.	Compact', close
Ex'ile banishment	Exile', small, slender
In'stinct, an impulse	Instinct', animated.
Min'ute of time	Minute', very small
Su'pine, in grammar.	Supine', indolent.

The word gallant departs from the above rule When it denotes a suitor, or "attentive to ladies," it is accented gallant', and is changed into gal'lant when it means high spirited or daring

TRISYLLABLES AND POLYSYLLABLES

§ 117 FOURTH PRINCIPLE — In words of three or more syllables there is a strong tendency to accent the antepenult or third syllable from the end, as in el'oquent, ac'cident, opportu'nity.

NOTE — This tendency is counteracted by that of derivation (Principle No 1, See § 112), and here arises another "conflict," which, to some extent, arrays our scholars on the one side, and the body of the people on the other Many scholars, for example, are strongly inclined to say contem'plate, dem'onstrate, confis'cate, obdu'rate, &c (forgetting that they come from participles, contempla'tus, demonstra'tus, &c), because by Latin rules their second syllable is long, while the mass of the people, who know nothing of Latin, and are governed by English analogies, are equally bent on saying con'template, dem'onstrate, ob'durate, &c. The latter pronunciation is now very extensively heard, and thus we have a "divided usage" in respect to these and similar words. There is a class of botanical and mineralogical terms ending in phyllous and phyllite (from Gr.

* Smart, speaking on the subject considered above, says, "There is a sort of repugnance to an ultimate accent unless on a verb, hence the uninitiated talk of selling con'sols, till they learn on the stock exchange that the technical pronunciation is consols'," i e , consolidated stocks A number of English orthoepists, being among the uninitiated, have accented this word on the first syllable, as every one pronounces it who has not taken his cue from the stock-brokers.

φύλλον, a leaf), as quadriphyllous, anthophyllite, &c , in which the same struggle is going on. Words having these terminations are differently accented by different authorities, and sometimes even by the same authority. Knowles, Gray, and Worcester are the only authorities who are self consistent in their pronunciation of such words,—Knowles accenting them all on the antepenult, Gray as uniformly on the penult, and Worcester giving an alternative in every case, the penultimate accentuation being his preference. There can be no doubt that that mode of pronunciation which places the accent on the antepenult is most in accordance with the genius of our language, and, in all probability, it will ultimately prevail over the learning or the pedantry of those who contend for the penultimate accentuation In like manner, bal'cony (for balco'ny) has now, according to Smart, become the true English pronunciation, and is so marked by Knowles, Webster, Cull, Wright, Cooley, and many more.

Ele'giac (for elegi'ac) is the general pronunciation of this country (in accordance with maniac and most other words in -ac), and has the sanction of Perry, Knowles, Wright, Clarke, Cull, Cooley, and Webster Quan'dary (for quanda'ry), in accordance with boundary and nearly every other word of three syllables in -ary, is our prevailing pronunciation, and is sanctioned by Maunder, Cull, Craig, Clarke, Cooley, Worcester, and Webster Many are disposed to reduce vaga'ry to the same accentuation (va'gary)

§ 118 It is a just principle, laid down by Walker, that "when words come to us whole from the Greek or Latin, the same accent ought to be preserved as in the original" Hence the following words ought to be accented as here marked, viz, Abdo'men, horı'zon, deco'rum, diplo'ma, muse'um, sono'rous, acu'men, bitu'men, and, on like grounds, fara'go, and others Yet the strong tendency of our language to accent the antepenultimate in all words of three or more syllables has caused this principle to be violated in some cases, as in am'azon, cic'atrix, min'ister, or'ator, pleth'ora, &c

§ 119 Words of more than two syllables having the same orthography are generally distinguished by a difference of accent, as at'tribute, n , and attrib'ute, v., miscon'duct, n , and misconduct', v , o'verthrow, n , and overthrow', v In such cases, the nouns have the accent further from the end

§ 120. With a very few exceptions, words of more than two syllables having the following terminations take the accent on the antepenult, or last syllable but two —

-cracy,	as, democ'racy, theoc'racy
-ferous,	as, somnif'erous, umbellif'erous.
-fluent,	as, af'fluent, circum'fluent
-fluous,	as, mellif'luous, superf'luous.
-gonal,	as, diag'onal, hexag'onal
-gony,	as, cosmog'ony, theog'ony
-grapher,	as, lexicog'rapher, stenog'rapher.
-graphy,	as, photog'raphy, typog'raphy
-loger,	as, philol'oger, astrol'oger
-logist,	as, entomol'ogist, physiol'ogist
-logy,	as, chronol'ogy, mythol'ogy
-loquy,	as, col'loquy, soli'loquy
-machy,	as, logom'achy, theom'achy
-mathy,	as, chrestom'athy, polym'athy
-meter,	as, barom'eter, hygrom'eter.
-metry,	as, altim'etry, geom'etry
nomy,	as, astron'omy, econ'omy
-parous,	as, ovip'arous, vivip'arous
-pathy,	as, ap'athy, antip'athy
-phony,	as, antiph'ony, coloph'ony
scopy,	as, acros'copy, deuteros'copy
-strophe,	as, apos'trophe, catas'trophe.
-tomy,	as, anat'omy, lithot'omy.
-trophy,	as, at'rophy, hyper'trophy
-vomous,	as, flammiv'omous, igniv'omous
-vorous,	as, carniv'orous, graminiv'orous.

§ 121. Words of more than two syllables, ending in -cate, -date, -gate, -fy, -tude, and -ty, preceded by a vowel, have, for the most part, the accent on the antepenult, as, dep'recate, rus'ticate, recip'rocate, an'tedate, elu'cidate, ac com'modate, prop'agate, del'egate, fu'migate, rar'efy, sanc'tify, qua'etude, lat'itude, soci'ety, acid'ity, dep'uty

§ 122. The penultimate syllable is to be accented in almost all words having the sound of sh, of zh, or of consonant y immediately before their last vowel or diphthong, except those words in which ch is sounded like sh (as capuchin, kap-yu-sheen'), e g., dona'tion, conces'sion, illu'sion, controver'sial, vermil'ion, opin'ion.

The Terminations IC and ICS

§ 123. Words ending in ic and ics (derivatives from words in ικος or icus, in Greek or Latin, or formed after the same analogy) have their accent on the penult, as, epidem'ic, scientif'ic, &c The following words are exceptions, having the accent on the antepenult, viz, ag'aric, Ar'abic, arith'metic, ar'senic, n., cath'olic, chol'eric, ephem'eric, her'etic, lu'natic, pleth'oric, pol'itic, rhet'oric, and tur'meric. Climacteric has usually the antepenultimate accent, though some pronounce it climacter'ic. In like manner, the nouns empiric and schismatic, and the noun and adjective splenetic, are sometimes accented on the penult, and sometimes on the antepenult.

The Terminations E-AL, E-AN, and E-UM.

§ 124. A part of the words having these terminations follow the English analogy, and take the antepenultimate accent, as, ceru'lean, hyperbo'rean, Hercu'lean, Mediterra'nean, subterra'nean, Tarta'rean, marmo'rean; petro'leum, perios'teum, succeda'neum. A part accent the penult; as, adamante'an, Atlante'an, colosse'an, empyre'an, Epicure'an, Europe'an, pygme'an; mausole'um, muse'um. Orphean, being derived from Or'pheus, is more properly accented Or'phean. Most words ending in eal accent the antepenult; as, lin'eal, ethe'real, fune'real; but hymene'al and tide'al take the accent upon the penult.

The Termination OSE.

§ 125 There is a considerable number of adjectives ending in ose, as animose, comatose, operose, &c , in the accentuation of which the dictionaries are at variance with each other, and many of them inconsistent with themselves. But all words of this class, as Walker remarks, ought, from their form and derivation, to be pronounced alike Walker himself accents them all upon the last syllable, and in this he is followed by Worcester and Cooley; but, in trisyllables having this termination, most recent authorities, following the natural tendency of the language, as well as the prevailing usage, give only a secondary accent to the last syllable, placing the principal accent on the antepenult. (See § 110, Note, second paragraph) As to dissyllable adjectives ending in ose, as jocose, morose, verbose, &c., they take the accent on the last syllable, with a few exceptions.

§ 126 In poetry, words are frequently used with an accentuation different from that adopted in ordinary speech, as in the following examples:—

'Twixt that and reason what a nice barrier'
Forever separate, yet forever near. Pope.

Ye ice-falls! ye that from the mountain's brow
Adown enormous ravines slope amain. Coleridge.

§ 127. When two words of similar formation and the same accentuation are contrasted with each other, the accent is transferred to the syllable of difference (unless this is already accented, as in em'inent, im'minent), and the regularly accented syllable takes a secondary accent, thus, undo' is pronounced un'do' when opposed to do or to out'do', and interrene' is pronounced in'terrene' when used antithetically to superene' So also with am'putation and im'putation, bi'en'nial and tri'en'nial, op'pose' and sup'pose', ex'er'cise and ex'or'cise, al le'gation and al li'gation, proph'et' and prof'it', do'nor' and do'nee', guar'antor' and guar'antee'

§ 128 When separately pronounced, all monosyllable words have their vowel as distinctly sounded as if under accent But in connected discourse, certain classes of monosyllables, such as articles, prepositions, pronouns, conjunctions, and auxiliary verbs, are usually unemphasized, and their vowel is liable to the same corruption of quality as that in an unaccented syllable of a word But when used antithetically to other words, they are emphasized, receiving a full and distinct stress of voice Thus, the possessive pronoun their, when emphatic, should take the full sound of ā, as, "Their (thār) interests, and not yours, are to be consulted" But when unemphatic, the sound becomes more obscure, verging toward, or falling into, that of the neutral vowel (u in urge), as, "They will not neglect their (thur) interests" So, also, there, when used as an adverb of place, is distinctly pronounced with the appropriate sound of the vowel, as, "I shall be there (thār)" When, however, it serves merely to introduce a verb or a sentence, it takes the obscurer sound, as, "There (thur) is no difficulty in the case" In like manner, we say ā, your, that, the, from, for, &c , when we pronounce the words by themselves, but in actual use they become nearly or quite ā, yur, thăt, thē, frŭm, fur, &c. The following passage from the Spectator, No 80, well illustrates this tendency to a corruption of the vowel sound in unemphasized monosyllables —"My lords, with humble submission that that I say is this, that thăt that thăt gentleman has advanced is not that that he should have proved to your lordships."

SYLLABICATION.

§ 129 Words are sometimes divided into syllables for the sole purpose of showing their proper pronunciation (as, a-dorn, o roid), and sometimes in order to exhibit their etymological composition merely, without the least regard to their pronunciation (as, ad-orn, or-oid). In ordinary cases,—as where a word requires to be divided at the end of a line,—these modes of syllabication are to a certain extent combined. In the United States, the etymological principle is allowed to operate only in separating prefixes, suffixes, and grammatical terminations from the radical part of the word, where this can be done without misrepresenting the pronunciation. In English practice, however, words are usually divided in such a manner as to show their constituent parts independently of the pronunciation (as, hypo-thesis, philo-sophy, belligerent, &c), and a single consonant or a consonant digraph between two vowels goes to the latter (as, a ma-to-my, de-li-cate, ma-the-ma tics, &c.). In this Dictionary, words are uniformly divided so as to represent their pronunciation in the most accurate manner, but very frequently the root of a word may be exhibited to the eye without violating the orthoëpical principle of syllabication, and, where this is possible, it has generally been done, more particularly in the case of accented syllables.

§130. SYNOPSIS OF WORDS DIFFERENTLY PRONOUNCED BY DIFFERENT ORTHOËPISTS.

NOTE.—The following Table contains a very careful selection of words of disputed pronunciation, being about 1350 in number. It would have been an easy task to make the list much larger; but it was deemed worse than useless to record all the modes of pronunciation which have at any time been in vogue, or to report the opinions or decisions of orthoëpists in those cases in which they have either been clearly ignorant of usage, or have sought to impose upon the public some private fancy or local practice. It would, for example, be of no practical utility whatever to quote Walker as authorizing ma-rō'der, instead of ma-rood'er, or Perry as saying pūl'pit for pul'pit, when these modes had only a temporary or local currency, or to cite Knowles and Jameson as sanctioning such barbarisms as tīr'jet and ur-bāne', when every body else says tēr'jet and ur bāne'. The exhibition of pronunciations like these might indeed gratify the curiosity of some, but is precluded by the very plan of the Synopsis, which is mainly designed to take note of words whose present pronunciation is a matter of doubt or controversy.

Of the orthoëpists here cited, six—viz., Perry, Walker, Knowles, Smart, Cooley, and Cull—are Englishmen, and two—Webster and Worcester—are Americans. Many other orthoëpists are quoted by Walker, Worcester, and Cooley, but these are the only ones whose opinions are now entitled to much consideration. They are arranged, as will be seen, in chronological order, and the latest edition published in the lifetime of their authors is that which is referred to. For obvious reasons, however, the first column contains the pronunciations given in the present revision of Webster's Dictionary, and not those contained in the edition of 1841, published shortly before Dr Webster's death.

The authorities brought forward in this Synopsis are by no means deserving of equal respect. Perry, the earliest in point of time, claims some attention as presenting the general usage of educated Englishmen of his own day, and also because his Dictionary—in an earlier and smaller form—was extensively circulated in this country during the latter part of the last century, and had a considerable influence upon the pronunciation of those who used it, and through them upon that of others.

Walker, who was a contemporary of Perry, possessed superior qualifications for editing a pronouncing dictionary. In early life, he was an actor, and familiarly acquainted with Garrick and other theatrical celebrities who trod the stage at a time when it was universally considered the model of correct speech. Subsequently, he established himself as a teacher of elocution, and becoming highly distinguished in that capacity, was patronized by many of the English nobility and gentry. In 1791, he published the first edition of his "Critical Pronouncing Dictionary and Expositor of the English Language." This work, which embodied the results of much careful observation and long-continued study of "the analogies of the language," became at once the popular manual of pronunciation, and ran through many editions both in England and America. And even now, after the lapse of more than half a century since the issue of the last edition revised by Walker himself, though custom has much changed in regard to many words, and though more recent and very meritorious works have taken its place, Walker's opinion and authority are too important to justify us in rejecting them altogether.

In 1835 appeared the "Pronouncing and Explanatory Dictionary" of James Knowles, a native of Ireland, a lecturer on elocution, and a nephew and pupil of Thomas Sheridan, the orthoëpist and lexicographer. Knowles's Dictionary was intended as a sort of revision of Sheridan's, but can hardly be regarded as an improvement upon the original. Although the author resided for many years in London, his style of pronunciation is, in a multitude of cases, decidedly provincial. In quite a number of instances, he seems to have put forward some favorite peculiarity of his own, in total disregard of actual usage. Comparatively little weight, therefore, is due to his decisions. Yet it should be said that occasionally the pronunciations which he advocates, though they may be opposed to the best English practice, accord with that which generally obtains in the United States.

In the following year, 1836, appeared a most excellent and elaborate Pronouncing Dictionary by R. H. Smart, who, in an "epitomized" edition published a few years later, says of himself, "I pretend to reflect the oral usage of English such as it is at present among the sensible and well-educated in the British metropolis, and I am now to state what my opportunities have been of learning that usage. I am a Londoner, the son of a Londoner, and have lived nearly all my life in London. My early days were spent in preparing for a literary profession, and a 'Practical Grammar of English Pronunciation,' which I published thirty years ago, is an evidence of the length of time during which my attention has been fixed on the subject in view. It has been said that the example of pronunciation should be taken not exclusively from those who move only in the highest circles, nor yet from those who devote all their time to learning. I have been able to observe the usage of all classes. As a teacher of the English language and literature, I have been admitted into some of the first families in the kingdom, as one partial to books, I have come much into contact with bookish men, while, as a public reader and lecturer, I have been obliged to fashion my own pronunciation to the taste of the day. Thus prepared, I may not unwarrantably believe that my opinion may have some value with those who seek the opinion of another to regulate their pronunciation."

The Pronouncing Dictionaries of Dr Joseph L. Worcester give evidence of protracted and conscientious attention to the subject of pronunciation, and display both soundness of judgment and refinement of taste.

The small but comprehensive Dictionary edited by Arnold J. Cooley affords a faithful view of the prevailing style of pronunciation characterizing the general body of cultivated speakers in Great Britain and Ireland. It is a production of considerable merit and authority.

The work cited under the name of Cull is the "Comprehensive English Dictionary" of Dr John Ogilvie, in which the pronunciation is professedly "adapted to the best modern usage," by Richard Cull, Esq., of London, one of the contributors to the Penny Cyclopedia, and well known as an enthusiastic and learned phonologist. "The best modern usage," however, is assumed to be that of educated society in the city of London, and the assertion is made that "no system of pronunciation can be regarded as correct unless it be in strict conformity" with this standard—an assertion which most persons in the United States would be apt to regard as involving a sophistical inference from an invalid assumption. It must be added, that though both Smart and Cull claim to exhibit the most approved London usage, they differ widely and often as to what that usage is. One reason for this difference probably is, that Cull pays less attention to analogy, in doubtful cases, than Smart does, and another is, that he sometimes apparently mistakes his individual practice for that of the best London society. Yet his opinions are, for the most part, worthy of attentive consideration, as being those of an independent, scholarly, and judicious observer, who has for many years made the subject of pronunciation a special study.

The diverse systems of notation employed by the orthoëpists whose modes of pronunciation are here reported are of necessity represented by that which is used in this Dictionary; and although, as a consequence, the precise shade of sound intended may not in all cases be expressed with minute accuracy, yet it is believed that very few, if any, important discrepancies will be found to exist. The chief instance of want of correspondence is the absence of any sign answering to the apostrophe used by Smart and Cooley, in certain classes of words, to mark "the sound as of a partially suppressed e," and that sign is therefore made use of in noting the pronunciation of these authorities in the Synopsis.

ORTHOGRAPHY.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE English language, as being the offspring of two parent languages very different in form and spirit, and having been, in no inconsiderable degree, modified in its growth by influences from various other tongues, contains, as was inevitable, very many anomalies, and in no particular are these anomalies more numerous and striking than in its orthography, with the single exception, perhaps, of its orthoepy Neither the Anglo-Saxon nor the Norman-French could boast of any great regularity in orthography, though the spelling of words in these two languages was far less arbitrary than it is in the modern English When, therefore, the vocabularies of these two languages, widely different both in their orthographical structure and their phonological character, were combined, the result was a language in which the orthography has almost reached the extreme of irregularity To such an extent, in fact, have the signs representing sounds been multiplied, that many of the letters are pronounced in several different ways, while the letters, or combinations of letters, for a single sound amount, in some cases, to scores Indeed, it is computed that many words of no more than two syllables may be spelled in several thousand different modes, by the use of combinations actually employed in other words in the language. The word scissors, for instance, may be thus written, as is computed by Ellis, in nearly six thousand different ways Of course, comparatively very few of these possible forms of spelling are ever employed in the case of any one word, yet the causes of disorder mentioned above have operated so effectually, that the words in respect to which even the most careful writers are at variance are numbered by thousands, while those in which an orthography contrary to analogy has been universally adopted are equally numerous

Bad as is the orthography of the present day, however, it is order itself compared with that of a few centuries ago It would, of course, be unreasonable to expect that there should be any general correspondence of orthographical forms in the works of different authors before the types of the printer gave prominence to certain forms, which finally became recognized as standards, and manuscripts conclusively prove that the wildest license prevailed in spelling words Even proper names, which would naturally receive more attention, and be written with more care than any other class of words, are found recorded in great multitudes of forms, several variations being sometimes found in the same manuscript or work Disraeli states that "Leicester has subscribed his own name eight different ways,' and that "the name Fillers is spelled fourteen different ways in the deeds of that family" A still more remarkable instance is stated by Lower, namely, that the family of Mainwaring has the extraordinary number of one hundred and thirty-one variations of that single name, all drawn from authorized documents But there is evidence that, in the midst of all this confusion, there were some writers who were attentive to the proper forms of words, and who were notable exceptions to the general rule The spelling of the Ormulum, which was written in the thirteenth century, though strange and cumbrous, is very remarkable for its regularity, and the author strenuously urges his copyists to follow his orthography with the utmost exactness. (See page xlii) So also Chaucer, more than a century later, carefully revised and corrected his own works, and he enjoined upon his scribe to "write more trew" that which was intrusted to him, saying that he was obliged "it to correct and eke to rubbe and scrape," because of the negligence and haste with which it had been copied

The invention of printing commenced a new era, though for a long time even this had little effect to fix the exterior form of the language Indeed, much of the perverse orthography of books printed two or three centuries ago is to be attributed to the printer, who often inserted or expunged letters, as the length of the lines or convenience of spacing required It is no uncommon thing to find, in the works of Chaucer, Spenser, and other early writers, or in books printed two or three centuries ago, the same words occurring in several different forms upon the same page Even as late as the time of Shakespeare, orthography was very unsettled, and, as Halliwell states, the name of the great bard himself was written in more than thirty different ways The printers, however, were not solely, nor even chiefly, responsible for this confusion, for it is certain that their arbitrary changes and deviations from uniformity would not have been tolerated had they been made in defiance of established usage, and there is abundant evidence to prove that writers themselves were careless in the extreme The fact must not be overlooked that in the writings of Wycliffe, Chaucer, and other early authors, there were still many remnants of the Semi-Saxon inflection, which have since utterly disappeared, and which gave to some words a variety of form to be attributed neither to the carelessness of the writer, nor to an unsettled orthography. For copious examples, see pages xxxix–xli.

The irregularities found in early books, though continuing for so long a time, were neither unnoticed nor looked upon with indifference On the contrary, not only have numerous complete systems for the reformation of orthography been proposed, but various scholars have advocated, with more or less acuteness and learning, changes in regard to a great number of particular points. Sir Thomas Smith, Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth, was the first who endeavored to introduce a regular system of orthography, after him, William Bullokar brought forward another system, a few years after this, Dr Gill, Master of St Paul's School, in London, a teacher of considerable eminence, proposed another scheme, and, still later, Charles Butler devised a new method of spelling, and printed a book in which it was employed These writers agreed essentially as to the manner in which they sought to attain the end proposed, their plan being to reduce the spelling of words to uniform principles and make it practically phonetic, by the use of new characters, by applying various diacritical marks to the old letters, and by making the letters or their combinations, represent certain definite sounds It is needless to say that these projects were never carried into practice

In the time of Charles I, many changes were introduced, and it was very common, even among eminent scholars, to spell words according to their pronunciation, omitting such letters as were deemed superfluous These attempts at improvement, being made upon no settled or uniform principles, had little or no permanent effect upon the language Another elaborate plan was proposed, in the seventeenth century, by Bishop Wilkins, similar in its general character to those of Smith, Bullokar, Gill, and Butler, and equally unsuccessful

The celebrated Dictionary of Dr Samuel Johnson, first published in 1755, has contributed more than any work written either before or since, to fix the external form of the language and to diminish the number of irregularities, for though numerous inconsistencies are to be found in it, and many oversights, the learning of the author, and the sound judgment and practical wisdom which he displayed, gave it at once an authority which it has not even yet entirely lost, and the orthography of the present day, though it has received some important modifications since his time, is substantially the same as that exhibited in his dictionary The changes in the spelling of words, introduced by Dr. Johnson, were generally made in order to restore the ancient orthography, or to remove some anomaly, and perhaps the most important office performed by his work was its having settled usage definitely in favor of some one of the numerous forms in which many words were written, thus removing the cause of much confusion Among the most prominent alterations made by him were the restoration of k to many words which had long been written without it, as in musick, rhetorick, and the like, and the insertion of u in the termination of many words which previously ended in or, as in ancestour, authour, errour, and others The former of these changes, a revival of the "ancient practice," was not received with favor, nor was this spelling adopted by subsequent writers, the latter, as it was thought to be justified by the analogy of the corresponding termination eur in the French, through which language many, perhaps a majority, of the words affected by it were derived from the Latin, was generally followed Johnson's practice in this respect, however, was not in harmony with his theory, for he wrote only about half the words of this class with the ending our, leaving the rest in or, though for no reason that would not equally apply to them all Yet this notable inconsistency was not only overlooked, but was perpetuated, and still exists in the orthography of English writers In the United States a different practice prevails, as will presently be mentioned.

The scheme of Pinkerton, who, in 1785, under the name of Robert Heron, proposed to render the language more euphonious by adding vowels to words ending in consonants, and by pronouncing the silent final vowels of others, in a manner perfectly arbitrary, is too ridiculous to deserve further mention About twenty years later another absurd plan was published by Elphinstone, who printed a book in order to introduce it, but without success During the last century, several English divines, as Lardner, Benson, and others, employed in many words methods of spelling peculiar to themselves, chiefly such as had long been abandoned, as in writing ie for final y, in adding e to words ending in ss, and in the use of such forms as præface, persue, procede, sais (for says), and the like So also Mitford used many singular forms, such as iland, intire, endeavor, meer (for mere), tho (for though), spred, &c It is proper to mention here also the innovations of Archdeacon Hare, in the present century, who, on the ground of pronunciation, etymology, and analogy, employed in his works such forms as atchieve, compell, enure, firy (for fiery), forein, inuey (for inveigh), highth, ploukman, smugler, and the like. He also omitted the hyphen in many compound words where it is usually inserted, and advocated the omission of the apostrophe in the possessive case, and the substitution of t for ed in those preterits in which the latter termination is pronounced like t, as in exprest, fixt, publisht, &c, for expressed, fixed, published, &c. This substitution of t for ed, however, is not peculiar to Hare, since it is merely a return to the usage of the early writers This spelling of the preterit is also not unfrequently found in modern poetry.

Besides the imperfect attempts mentioned above, many plans have been devised at different times, for reducing the spelling of words to absolute uniformity and the greatest simplicity, by a complete reform in the method of representing the sounds of words by written characters, that is, by employing a new alphabet in which each sign stands for one and only one definite sound, and each sound is represented by one and only one character. Such a method of spelling was invented by Dr Franklin, in the last century, though he never brought it to perfection, and scarcely used it, except in a brief correspondence with a friend. The most recent, and in every respect the most comprehensive and philosophical scheme of this kind, is that of which Mr A J. Ellis, of Cambridge, England, has been the most prominent advocate and representative, and to a large extent the inventor The alphabet in this system contains about forty characters, each of which represents but a single sound, so that a word written according to this method could be pronounced in only one way Although this system has received great publicity, and has had many earnest supporters, it has gained no ground in the public favor, and has finally been abandoned by its author as a means of reforming orthography. The schemes of Lepsius, Müller, and others who have endeavored to form philosophical alphabets of universal application, are hardly to be mentioned here, as they are but indirectly related to English orthography.

In 1828, Dr. Webster published his dictionary of the English language, and the changes in spelling advocated by him have had no inconsiderable influence upon orthography, especially in the United States These alterations were proposed by him chiefly on the ground of etymology and of analogy, from a desire, on the one hand, to make the words correspond, as far as practicable, with their primitive forms, so as to reveal more clearly their etymological affinities, and on the other to reduce as much as possible the number of anomalies and exceptional cases. Of the words whose orthography had been changed for the former reason, many were restored to their ordinary forms by Dr. Webster himself in the second edition of his work published in 1840, and others still were restored in subsequent editions. The alterations of the second class have been received with favor and adopted by a large portion of the writers in the United States, and by some authors also in England.

It is to be observed that many of Dr. Webster's deviations from the usage of his time were not innovations, but restorations of older forms which were once very generally employed. The most important points in which his orthography differs from that of most other modern lexicographers, and in reference to which there is still difference of usage among scholars, are stated in the following list, in which the numbers refer to the sections of the Rules for Spelling Certain Classes of Words (see below), where the cases are mentioned particularly These are, the not doubling the final consonant in derivatives of words like travel, worship, &c. (§ 8), doubling the l in installment, enrollment, &c (§ 9), doubling the final letter in such words as fulfill, instill, &c (§ 10), retaining the i in derivatives of villain (§ 27), writing defense, offense, &c., for defence, offence, &c, and practice for practise (§ 27), writing the termination er for re in words like center, meter, &c (§ 31), writing mold and molt without u (§ 34)

With respect to certain cases, it seems proper to add a few words. Dr Webster wrote the chemical terms ending in ide and ine, as chloride, chlorine, &c (§ 32), without the final e in most cases, deeming the letter superfluous, and not demanded by usage, which was variable This letter is retained in this volume, in accordance with the almost universal practice of the present day The word written by Dr Webster oxyd is now spelled oxide, for reasons stated in section 32 and under the word itself in the Dictionary. It may be remarked further with regard to words often written with the termination re, but which in this book are spelled with the ending er, that this orthography is but a restoration of the older spelling, and the same is true of the substitution of the termination or for our.

RULES FOR SPELLING CERTAIN CLASSES OF WORDS,

FOUNDED ON THE ORTHOGRAPHY OF DR WEBSTER, AS EXHIBITED IN THIS VOLUME.

§ 1. The letters f and l, at the end of monosyllables, and standing immediately after single vowels, are generally doubled as in staff, cliff, doff, puff, all, bell, hill, toll, null The words clef, if, of, pal, and sol, are exceptions

§ 2. The letter s, at the end of a monosyllable, and standing immediately after a single vowel, is generally doubled, except when it is used to form the possessive case or plural of a noun, or the third person singular of a verb as in grass, press, hiss, moss, truss The only important exceptions are as, gas, has was, yes, gris, his, is, thus, and us

§ 3 Besides f, l, and s, the only consonants that are ever doubled at the end of a word are b, d, g, m, n, p, r, t, and z The following list contains all, or nearly all, the words in which these letters are doubled namely, abb, ebb add, odd, rudd; bigg, egg, snigg, lamm, scomm, mumm (to mask), inn, bunn wapp, gnarr, parr, err, birr, shirr, skirr, burr, hurr, murr, purr, mutt, plutt, smutt, butt, fizz, fuzz, buzz, huzz, muzz

NOTE.—The words let, net, and set are sometimes incorrectly spelled lett, nett, and sett, and some other words which should have the final letter single are spelled, by some writers, with it doubled

§ 4 A consonant standing at the end of a word immediately after a diphthong or double vowel is never doubled The words ail, peat, haul, door, and mourn, are examples The word guess is only an apparent exception, as the u does not strictly form a diphthong with the e, but serves merely to render the g hard

§ 5. Monosyllables ending, as pronounced, with the sound of k, and in which c follows the vowel, have usually k added after the c, as in black, fleck, clack, knock, and buck The words lac, sac, talc, zinc, ploc, roc, soc, arc, marc, orc, and disc, are exceptions.

Words of more than one syllable, ending in ic or ac, which formerly ended in k, also words derived from the Latin or Greek languages or from other sources, and similar to these, or formed in an analogous manner, are now written without the k, as, maniac, elegiac, cubic, music, public The word derrick is an exception Words of more than one syllable, in which c is preceded by other vowels than i or a, commonly end in ck; as, arrack, barrack, hammock, hillock, wedlock The words almanac, sandarac, lumbec, mamoc, rebec, havoc, are exceptions. Almanac, lumbec, and havoc, however, are sometimes written with k after the c, especially in England

§ 6. In derivatives formed from words ending in c, by adding a termination beginning with e, i, or y, the letter k is inserted after the c, in order that the latter may not be inaccurately pronounced like s before the following vowel as, colic, colicky, traffic, trafficked, trafficking, trafficker, talc, talcky; zinc, zincky.

§ 7. In derivatives formed by adding a termination beginning with a vowel to monosyllables and words accented on the last syllable, when these words end in a single consonant (except h and x) preceded by a single vowel, that consonant is doubled: as, clan, clannish, plan, planned, planning, planner, bag, baggage; hot, hotter, hottest, wit, witty, cabal', cabal'ler, abet', abet'ted, abet'ting, abet'tor; begin', begin'ning, begin'ner; infer', inferred', infer'ring. The consonant is doubled in these words in order to preserve the short sound of the vowel, as otherwise the latter would be liable to be pronounced long. Thus, plănned, hŏttest, and abĕtted, would naturally be pronounced plānēd, hōtest, and abētted, if the consonant were not doubled. Words of this class, in which the final consonant is preceded by qu, followed by a single vowel, form no exception to the rule, since the u performs the office of the consonant w as, squab, squabbish, squabby, squat, squatting, squatter, quit, quitted, quitting, acquit', acquit'ted, acquit'ting

The derivatives of the word gas (except gassing and gassy) are written with but one s, as, gaseous, gaseity, gasify Excellence, as being from the Latin excellens, retains the double l, though one l has been dropped from the termination of excel' Besides these, the only exceptions to the rule are those derivatives in which the accent of the primitive is thrown back upon another syllable as, cabal', cabalism, cabalist, prefer', preference, refer', reference, defer', deference It is no exception to this rule that chancellor, and the derivatives of metal and crystal, as metalloid, metallurgy, crystalline, crystallize, and the like, are written with the l doubled, since they are derived respectively from the Latin cancellarius (through the French), and metallum, and the Greek κρυσταλλος So also the word tranquillity retains the double l, as being from the Latin tranquillitas, while the English derivatives of tranquil, though often written with two l's, are more properly written with only one, as tranquilize, tranquilizer, and the like.

§ 8 When a diphthong, or a digraph representing a vowel sound, precedes the final consonant of a word, or the accent of a word ending in a single consonant falls on any other syllable than the last, or when the word ends in two different consonants, the final consonant is not doubled in derivatives formed by the addition of a termination beginning with a vowel as, daub, daubed, daubed, daubing, needy, brief, briefer, briefest, revel, reveled, reveling, traveled, traveling, traveler, profit, profited, act, acted, actor, perform, performer, stand, standing

The final consonant is doubled in the derivatives of a few words ending in g, in order to diminish the liability to its being pronounced like j, before e or i as humbug, humbugged, humbugging; perwig, perwigged The word woolen is more generally thus written, in the United States, with one l but in England it is written woollen

NOTE.—There is a large class of words ending in a single consonant, and accented on some other syllable than the last, the final consonants of which are, by very many writers and lexicographers, doubled in their derivatives, unnecessarily and contrarily to analogy This practice appears to have arisen from a desire to prevent the vowel of the final syllable of the primitive from being inaccurately pronounced long in the derivatives These words are chiefly those ending in l, with also a few of other terminations The following list, the words in which are chiefly verbs, includes the most important of those in regard to which usage varies namely, apparel, barrel, bevel, bias, bowel and its compounds, cancel, carburet and all similar words ending in uret, carol, carol, channel, chisel, compromit, counsel, cudgel, dial, disherel, dowel, drivel, duel, empanel, enamel, equal, funnel, gambol, gravel, grovel, handsel, hatchel, imperil, jewel, kennel, kidnap, label, laurel, level, libel, marshal, marvel, metal, medal, model, panel, parallel, parcel, pencil, peril, pistol, pommel, quarrel, ravel, revel, rivel, rowel, shovel, shrivel, snivel, tassel, tinsel, trammel, travel, tunnel, unravel, vial, victual, worship Worcester doubles the final letters of all these words, except parallel, in forming derivatives by the addition of terminations beginning with vowels, though he remarks, with respect to those ending in l, that "it better accords with the analogy of the language" to spell their derivatives with but one l Smart retains the double consonant in this class of words solely on

Sir Thomas Smith, Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth, was the first who endeavored to introduce a regular system of orthography, after him, William Bullokar brought forward another system, a few years after this, Dr Gill, Master of St Paul's School, in London, a teacher of considerable eminence, proposed another scheme, and, still later, Charles Butler devised a new method of spelling, and printed a book in which it was employed These writers agreed essentially as to the manner in which they sought to attain the end proposed, their plan being to reduce the spelling of words to uniform principles and make it practically phonetic, by the use of new characters, by applying various diacritical marks to the old letters, and by making the letters or their combinations, represent certain definite sounds It is needless to say that these projects were never carried into practice

In the time of Charles I, many changes were introduced, and it was very common, even among eminent scholars, to spell words according to their pronunciation, omitting such letters as were deemed superfluous These attempts at improvement, being made upon no settled or uniform principles, had little or no permanent effect upon the language Another elaborate plan was proposed, in the seventeenth century, by Bishop Wilkins, similar in its general character to those of Smith, Bullokar, Gill, and Butler, and equally unsuccessful

The celebrated Dictionary of Dr Samuel Johnson, first published in 1755, has contributed more than any work written either before or since, to fix the external form of the language and to diminish the number of irregularities, for though numerous inconsistencies are to be found in it, and many oversights, the learning of the author, and the sound judgment and practical wisdom which he displayed, gave it at once an authority which it has not even yet entirely lost, and the orthography of the present day, though it has received some important modifications since his time, is substantially the same as that exhibited in his dictionary The changes in the spelling of words, introduced by Dr Johnson, were generally made in order to restore the ancient orthography, or to remove some anomaly, and perhaps the most important office performed by his work was its having settled usage definitely in favor of some one of the numerous forms in which many words were written, thus removing the cause of much confusion Among the most prominent alterations made by him were the restoration of k to many words which had long been written without it, as in musick, rhetorick, and the like, and the insertion of u in the termination of many words which previously ended in or, as in ancestour, authour, errour, and others The former of these changes, a revival of the "ancient practice," was not received with favor, nor was this spelling adopted by subsequent writers, the latter, as it was thought to be justified by the analogy of the corresponding termination eur in the French through which language many, perhaps a majority, of the words affected by it were derived from the Latin, was generally followed Johnson's practice in this respect, however, was not in harmony with his theory, for he wrote only about half the words of this class with the ending our, leaving the rest in or, though for no reason that would not equally apply to them all Yet this notable inconsistency was not only overlooked, but was perpetuated, and still exists in the orthography of English writers In the United States a different practice prevails, as will presently be mentioned

The scheme of Pinkerton, who, in 1785, under the name of Robert Heron, proposed to render the language more euphonious by adding vowels to words ending in consonants, and by pronouncing the silent final vowels of others, in a manner perfectly arbitrary, is too ridiculous to deserve further mention About twenty years later another absurd plan was published by Lilphinstone, who printed a book in order to introduce it, but without success During the last century, several English divines, as Lardner, Benson, and others, employed in many words methods of spelling peculiar to themselves, chiefly such as had long been abandoned, as in writing se for final y, in adding e to words ending in ss, and in the use of such forms as præface, persue, procede, saus (for says), and the like So also Mitford used many singular forms, such as aland, intire, endeavor, mer (for mere), tho (for though), spred, &c It is proper to mention here also the innovations of Archdeacon Hare, in the present century, who, on the ground of pronunciation, etymology, and analogy, employed in his works such forms as atchieve, compell, enure, fry (for fiery), forein, inuy (for inveigh), highth, ploughman, smuggler, and the like He also omitted the hyphen in many compound words where it is usually inserted, and advocated the omission of the apostrophe in the possessive case, and the substitution of t for ed in those preterits in which the latter termination is pronounced like t, as in exprest, past, publisht, &c, for expressed, fixed, published, &c This substitution of t for ed, however, is not peculiar to Hare, since it is merely a return to the usage of the early writers This spelling of the preterit is also not unfrequently found in modern poetry

Besides the imperfect attempts mentioned above, many plans have been devised at different times, for reducing the spelling of words to absolute uniformity and the greatest simplicity, by a complete reform in the method of representing the sounds of words by written characters, that is, by employing a new alphabet in which each sign stands for one and only one definite sound, and

each sound is represented by one and only one character Such a method of spelling was invented by Dr Franklin, in the last century, though he never brought it to perfection, and scarcely used it, except in a brief correspondence with a friend. The most recent, and in every respect the most comprehensive and philosophical scheme of this kind, is that of which Mr A J Ellis, of Cambridge, England, has been the most prominent advocate and representative, and to a large extent the inventor The alphabet in this system contains about forty characters, each of which represents but a single sound, so that a word written according to this method could be pronounced in only one way Although this system has received great publicity, and has had many earnest supporters, it has gained no ground in the public favor, and has finally been abandoned by its author as a means of reforming orthography The schemes of Lepsius, Müller, and others who have endeavored to form philosophical alphabets of universal application, are hardly to be mentioned here, as they are but indirectly related to English orthography

In 1828, Dr Webster published his dictionary of the English language, and the changes in spelling advocated by him have had no inconsiderable influence upon orthography, especially in the United States These alterations were proposed by him chiefly on the ground of etymology and of analogy, from a desire, on the one hand, to make the words correspond, as far as practicable, with their primitive forms, so as to reveal more clearly their etymological affinities, and on the other to reduce as much as possible the number of anomalies and exceptional cases. Of the words whose orthography had been changed for the former reason, many were restored to their ordinary forms by Dr. Webster himself in the second edition of his work published in 1840, and others still were restored in subsequent editions. The alterations of the second class have been received with favor and adopted by a large portion of the writers in the United States, and by some authors also in England.

It is to be observed that many of Dr Webster's deviations from the usage of his time were not innovations, but restorations of older forms which were once very generally employed The most important points in which his orthography differs from that of most other modern lexicographers, and in reference to which there is still difference of usage among scholars, are stated in the following list, in which the numbers refer to the sections of the Rules for Spelling, Certain Classes of Words (see below), where the cases are mentioned particularly These are, the not doubling the final consonant in derivatives of words like travel, worship, &c (§ 8), doubling the l in installment, enrollment, &c (§ 9), doubling the final letter in such words as fulfill, instill, &c (§ 16), retaining the i in derivatives of villain (§ 27), writing defense, offense, &c, for defence, offence, &c, and practice for practise (§ 27), writing the termination er for re in words like center, meter, &c (§ 31), writing mold and molt without u (§ 31)

With respect to certain cases, it seems proper to add a few words. Dr Webster wrote the chemical terms ending in ide and ine, as chloride, chlorine, &c (§ 32), without the final e in most cases, deeming the letter superfluous, and not demanded by usage, which was variable This letter is retained in this volume, in accordance with the almost universal practice of the present day The word written by Dr Webster oxyd is now spelled oxide, for reasons stated in section 32 and under the word itself in the Dictionary It may be remarked further with regard to words often written with the termination re, but which in this book are spelled with the ending er, that this orthography is but a restoration of the older spelling, and the same is true of the substitution of the termination or for our.

RULES FOR SPELLING CERTAIN CLASSES OF WORDS,

FOUNDED ON THE ORTHOGRAPHY OF DR WEBSTER, AS EXHIBITED IN THIS VOLUME.

§ 1 The letters f and l, at the end of monosyllables, and standing immediately after single vowels, are generally doubled as in staff, cliff, doff, puff, all, bell, hill, toll, null The words clef, if, of, pal, and sol, are exceptions

§ 2 The letter s, at the end of a monosyllable, and standing immediately after a single vowel, is generally doubled, except when it is used to form the possessive case or plural of a noun, or the third person singular of verbs as in grass, press, hiss, moss, truss The only important exceptions are as, gas, has was, yes, gris, his, is, thus, and us

§ 3 Besides f, l, and s, the only consonants that are ever doubled at the end of a word are b, d, g, m, n, p, r, t, and The following list contains all or nearly all, the words in which these letters are doubled namely abb, ebb, add, odd, rudd, bigg, egg, snigg, lamm, scomm, mumm (to mask) inn, bunn, napp, gnarr, parr, err, birr, shirr, skirr, burr, hurr, marr, purr, mutt, platt, smitt, butt, fizz, fuzz, buzz, huzz, muzz

NOTE — The words let, net, and set are sometimes incorrectly spelled lett, nett, and sett, and some other words which should have the final letter single are spelled, by some writers, with it doubled

§ 4 A consonant standing at the end of a word immediately after a diphthong or double vowel is never doubled The words ail, peat, haul, door and mourn are examples The word guess is only an apparent exception, as the u does not strictly form a diphthong with the e, but serves merely to render the g hard

§ 5 Monosyllables ending, as pronounced with the sound of k, and in which c follows the vowel, have usually k added after the c, as in black, fleck, clock, knock, and buck The words lac, sac, talc, zinc, ploc, roc, soc, arc, marc, orc, and zinc, are exceptions

Words of more than one syllable, ending in c or ac, which formerly ended in k, also words derived from the Latin or Greek languages or from other sources, and similar to these or formed in an analogous manner, are now written without the k, as, maniac, elegiac, cubic, music, public The word derrick is an exception Words of more than one syllable, in which c is preceded by other vowels than i or u, commonly end in ck, as, arrack, barrack, hammock, hillock, wedlock The words almanac, sandarac, lumbec, mamoc, tobac, havoc, are exceptions Almanac, limbec, and havoc, however, are sometimes written with k after the c, especially in England

§ 6 In derivatives formed from words ending in c, by adding a termination beginning with e, i, or y, the letter k is inserted after the c, in order that the latter may not be inaccurately pronounced like s before the following vowel as, colic, colicky, traffic, trafficked, trafficking, trafficker, talc, talcky, zinc, zincky.

§ 7. In derivatives formed by adding a termination beginning with a vowel to monosyllables and words accented on the last syllable, when these words end in a single consonant (except h and x) preceded by a single vowel, that consonant is doubled: as, clan, clannish, plan, planned, planning, planner, bag, baggage, hot, hotter, hottest, wit, witty, cabal', cabal'ler, abet', abet'ted, abet'ting, abet'tor; begin', begin'ning, begin'ner, infer', inferred', inferring. The consonant is doubled in these words in order to preserve the short sound of the vowel, as otherwise the latter would be liable to be pronounced long. Thus, plănned, hŏttest, and abĕtted, would naturally be pronounced plāned, hōtest, and abēted, if the consonant were not doubled Words of this class, in which the final consonant is preceded by qu, followed by a single vowel, form no exception to the rule, since the u performs the office of the consonant w as, squab, squabbish, squabby, squat, squatting, squatter, quit, quitted, quitting, acquit', acquitted, acquitting

The derivatives of the word gas (except gassing and gassy) are written with but one s, as, gaseous, gasety, gasify Excellence, as being from the Latin excellens, retains the double l, though one l has been dropped from the termination of cel Besides these, the only exceptions to the rule are those derivatives in which the accent of the primitive is thrown back upon another syllable as, cabal', cabalism, cabalist prefer', preference refer', reference, defer', deference It is no exception to this rule that chancellor, and the derivatives of metal and crystal, as metalloid, metallurgy, crystalline, crystallize, and the like, are written with the l doubled, since they are derived respectively from the Latin cancellarius (through the French), and metallum, and the Greek κρύσταλλος So also the word tranquillity retains the double l, as being from the Latin tranquillitas, while the English derivatives of tranquil, though often written with two l's, are more properly written with only one, as tranquilize, tranquilizer, and the like

§ 8 When a diphthong, or a digraph representing a vowel sound, precedes the final consonant of a word, or the accent of a word ending in a single consonant falls on any other syllable than the last, or when the word ends in two different consonants, the final consonant is not doubled in derivatives formed by the addition of a termination beginning with a vowel as, daub, daubed, dauber need, needy, brief, briefer, briefest, revel, reveled, reveling travel, traveling, traveler, profit, profited, act, acted, actor perform, performer, stand, standing

The final consonant is doubled in the derivatives of a few words ending in g, in order to diminish the liability to its being pronounced like j, before e or i as humbug, humbugged, humbugging periwig, periwigged The word woolen is more generally thus written, in the United States, with one l but in England it is written woollen

NOTE — There is a large class of words ending in a single consonant, and accented on some other syllable than the last, the final consonants of which are, by very many writers and lexicographers, doubled in their derivatives, unnecessarily and contrarily to analogy This practice appears to have arisen from a desire to prevent the vowel of the final syllable of the primitive from being inaccurately pronounced long in the derivatives These words are chiefly those ending in l, with also a few of other terminations The following list, the words in which are chiefly verbs, includes the most important of those in regard to which usage varies namely, apparel, barrel, bevel, bias, bowel and its compounds, cancel, carburet and all similar words ending in uret, carol, channel, chisel, compromit, counsel, cudgel, dial, dishevel, dowel, drivel, duel, empanel, enamel, equal, fannel, gambol, gravel, grovel, handsel, hatchel, impanel, jewel, kennel, kidnap, label, laurel, level, libel, marshal, marvel, metal, medal, model, panel, parallel, parcel, pencil, peril, pistol, pommel, quarrel, rancl, revel, rivel, rowel, shovel, shrivel snivel, tassel, tinsel, trammel, travel, tunnel, unravel, vial, victual, worship Worcester doubles the final letters of all these words, except parallel, in forming derivatives by the addition of terminations beginning with vowels, though he remarks, with respect to those ending in l, that "it better accords with the analogy of the language" to spell their derivatives with but one l Smart retains the double consonant in this class of words solely on the ground that usage favors it, but remarks that "the double p in worshipped, worshipper, &c., the second l in travelling, traveller, &c, are quite unnecessary on any other score than to satisfy the prejudices of the eye." Cooley doubles the consonant in a majority of the derivatives of words of this class, but writes a single consonant in many, as in those of apparel, barrel, bevel, channel, drivel, gambol, &c Perry wrote the derivatives of these words with but one l, according to the rule, and the same practice was advocated by Walker Conformity to the regular rule has been advocated also by other eminent scholars

§ 9. Derivatives formed from words ending in a double consonant, by adding one or more syllables, commonly retain both consonants as, ebb, ebbing, odd, oddly; stiff, stiffness, fell, fellable, skill, skillful, skillfulness, will, willful, willfulness, dull, dullness; full, fullness So also the double l is retained in the words installment, enthrallment, thralldom, and enrollment (from install, enthrall, thrall, and enroll), in order to prevent a false pronunciation if spelled with one l Many writers and lexicographers, especially in England, omit one l in these words, as also in the derivatives of skill, will, dull, and full, formed by adding the syllables ly and ness

The derivatives of pontiff are exceptions to the rule, being written with only one f, as, pontific, pontifical, pontificial, and the like One l is also dropped in a few words formed by adding the termination ly to words ending in ll, in order to prevent the concurrence of three l's: as, ill, illy, dull, dully, full, fully Words similarly formed by adding the termination less, however, are written either with the three l's, a hyphen being inserted before the termination, or with two l's, and without the hyphen, as, bell-less or belless, skill-less or skilless, smell-less or smelless

§ 10 In derivatives formed from words ending with silent e, the e is generally retained when the termination begins with a consonant as, pale, paleness, hate, hateful, incite, incitement, chaste, chastely, chasteness, move, movement When, however, the e is immediately preceded by another vowel (except e), it is often dropped from the derivative as, due, duly, argue, argument, true, truly, awe, awful, and the derivatives and compounds of these words

The words wholly, nursling, wisdom, abridgment, acknowledgment, lodgment, judgment, and the compounds of some of these, are exceptions The last four, however, are written, by many authors, abridgement, acknowledgement, lodgement, judgement

§ 11 In derivatives formed from words ending with silent e, when the termination begins with a vowel, the e is generally omitted, except in the cases mentioned in the next paragraph as, brute, brutal, guide, guidance, plume, plumage, use, usage, grieve, grievance, come, coming, shape, shaping, move, movable, sale, salable, fleece, fleecy, force, forcible, true, truism

The e is retained in the words hoeing, shoeing, and toeing (from hoe, shoe, and toe), in order to prevent a doubt, as to the pronunciation, that might arise in case it were omitted It is retained, also, in the words dyeing, singeing, springeing, swingeing, tingeing (from dye, singe, springe, swinge, tinge), to distinguish them from dying, singing, springing, swinging, tinging (from die, sing, spring, swing, ting) The word mileage, as commonly written, does not omit the e, though it is sometimes, and more correctly, spelled milage The words lineage, lineal, and pineal, though apparently exceptions, are not really such, since they are derived not directly from line and pine, but from the Latin linea (through the French), lineatis, and pinea The e, standing, in a derivative, before a termination beginning with a or o, and immediately after c or g, is retained in order to prevent the pronunciation of these consonants with the hard sound, as, peace, peaceable, notice, noticeable, manage, manageable, change, changeable, advantage, advantageous, outrage, outrageous, mortgage, mortgageor The latter word is sometimes very improperly written mortgagor, and pronounced mor'ga-jor.

§ 12 In derivatives formed from words ending in ie, by adding the termination ing, the e is dropped, and the i changed to y, in order to prevent two i's from coming together as, die, dying lie, lying, tie, tying, vie, vying

§ 13. In derivatives of words ending in y, preceded by a consonant, and formed by appending any termination except one beginning with i, the y is usually changed into i as, icy, iciest, icily, mercy, merciless, tidy, tidiness, modify, modifies, foggy, fogginess, earthy, earthiness, pity, pitiful

The derivatives of adjectives of one syllable ending in y, preceded by a consonant, are exceptions, and usually retain the y: as, shy, shyness; sly, slyest, dry, dryly; spry, spryer, spryest, wry, wryness But the adjectives drier, and driest, from dry, are commonly written with i instead of y Derivatives formed by adding the termination ship, as secretaryship, suretyship, ladyship, and the like, also retain the y, though some authors write them with i, according to the rule. The words babyhood and ladykin are likewise exceptions The y is also retained in the possessive case singular of nouns, when formed by adding s with the apostrophe, as, country's, everybody's

§ 14 Derivatives formed by affixing a termination to words ending in y preceded by a vowel, generally retain the y unchanged as, gay, gayety, gayly, play, player, plays, sway, swayed, obey obeying, joy, joyful, enjoy, enjoyed, buy, buying, gluey, glueyness

The words daily, laid, paid, said, saith, slain, and staid (from day, lay, pay, say, slay, and stay), with their compounds, are exceptions. Staid, however, is sometimes written stayed Derivatives from words ending in uy, as colloquies, from colloquy, are not exceptions to the rule, as u, in such cases, is not strictly a vowel, but stands for the consonant w

§ 15 Derivatives formed by appending a syllable beginning with a vowel to words ending with a vowel sound, generally retain the letter or letters representing such sound as, huzza, huzzaed; agree, agreeable, agreeing, weigh, weighing; dough, doughy; echo, echoed, woo, wooes; bow, bowed; beau, beauish

Derivatives of words of this class ending in silent e, as also those formed from words ending in double e by adding a termination beginning with e, drop the final e: as, hoe, hoed; sue, sued; owe, owed; free, freer, freest; agree, agreed. The cases mentioned in sections 11, 12, and 13 are also exceptions, § 16 Derivatives formed by prefixing one or more syllables to words ending in a double consonant commonly retain both consonants: as, tipstaff, rebuff, befall, enthrall, distinthrall, foretell, undersell, fulfill, enroll, emboss (from staff, buff, full, thrall, tell, sell, fill, roll, boss).

The word until is an exception, being always written with one l. Those words of this class which end in ll are written by some authors, especially in England, with one l, as, befal, enthral, foretel, fulfil, enrol. The words distill and instill should be written with the l doubled, though they are often written distil and instil, with only one l.

§ 17 Compound words formed by joining two or more words commonly retain all the letters of the simple words; as, stiff-necked, well-bred, dull-eyed, save-all, wide-mouthed.

There are numerous exceptions to this rule, many of them compounds which by long use have acquired the force of single words. They are the following: namely, some compounds of all and well; as, almighty, almost, alone, already, also, although, altogether, always, withal, therewithal, wherewithal, welcome, welfare,—compound of mass, as, Candlemas, Christmas, Lammas, Michaelmas, &c,—words of which the second part is the adjective full; as, artful, hateful, rueful, woeful; also, the words chiblain, fulfill, namesake, neckerchief, nunskull, pastime, standish, and wherever.

§ 18 The plural of nouns regularly ends in s, or, in certain classes of words, in es

When the noun in the singular ends with such a sound that the sound of s can unite with it, and be pronounced without forming a separate syllable, s only is added in forming the plural: as, sea, seas, tree, trees, woe, woes, canto, cantos, virtue, virtues, purlieu, purlieus, claw, claws, cab, cabs, panic, panics, bead, beads, chief, chiefs, bag, bags, path, paths, lock, locks, bell, bells, gem, gems, fan, fans, cup, cups, ear, ears, act, acts. A few plurals from nouns ending in o preceded by a consonant, end in es: as, echo, echoes, cargo, cargoes, embargo, embargoes, motto, mottoes, potato, potatoes Other nouns of this class generally form their plurals regularly, though usage differs with regard to some of them Those in which final o is preceded by a vowel form their plurals regularly. The plural of alkali is written alkalis or alkalies, that of rabbi, either rabbis or rabbies With regard to other nouns ending in i usage differs, though they are more properly written with the termination is

When the noun in the singular ends with such a sound (as that of ch, sh, j, s, x, or z) that the sound of s can not unite with it in pronunciation, but must form a separate syllable, e is inserted before s in forming the plural, unless the word ends with silent e, in which case the latter serves to form a separate syllable with s: as, church, churches, rush, rushes, age, ages, lace, laces, gas, gases, case, cases, loss, losses, box, boxes, maze, mazes

To express the plural of a letter, figure, or any character or sign, or of a word mentioned without regard to its meaning, the letter s, generally preceded by the apostrophe, is appended, as in the phrases, "The two i's in all," "The two 0's in 400," "Two s's in Orion," "The why's and wherefore's of the question" Some writers, however, omit the apostrophe in such cases, joining the s immediately to the letter, character, or word, as in the phrases "The two ls in all," "Two *s*s in Orion," "The pros and cons" Others still write the names of the letters with their proper plural endings, instead of the letters themselves, as, the two ees, ejs, ells, esses, and the like. The plurals of letters are also rarely expressed by simply doubling them, without adding any plural sign, as, the two ee in bee, the two ll in all, but this practice is not to be commended, as ee, ll, &c, are properly read double e, double l, and the like.

§ 19. Nouns ending in y preceded by a consonant form their plural by adding es and changing y into i: as, mercy, mercies, lady, ladies, sky, skies, army, armies, pity, pities This rule includes words ending in quy, in which u, being pronounced like w, is strictly a consonant, as, colloquy, colloquies The plural of proper nouns ending in y preceded by a consonant, is formed by changing y into ies, according to the rule, as, "The three Maries." Many writers, however, form the plural of such words by simply adding s, as, "The three Marys," but for this practice there seems to be no good reason.

When the singular of a noun ends in y preceded by a vowel (except u having the power of w), the plural is regularly formed by adding s only as, day, days; key, keys, money, moneys, attorney, attorneys, alloy, alloys, guy, guys Some plurals of the latter class are often inaccurately written with the termination ies, as, monies, attornies, and the like.

NOTE.—Nouns now ending in y formerly ended in ie, and formed their plurals regularly by adding s, as, memorie, memories, mercie, mercies. I was finally substituted for ie in the singular, but the plural was not changed, and still retains its old form.

§ 20. The plurals of a few nouns ending in f or fe are irregularly formed by changing f or fe into ves The following words, with their compounds, are the principal examples: namely, life, lives, knife, knives, wife, wives; leaf, leaves, sheaf, sheaves, loaf, loaves; beef, beeves, thief, thieves; calf, calves, half, halves, elf, elves; shelf, shelves, self, selves, wolf, wolves. The plural of staff is sometimes written staffs, but more commonly staves, except when it means a corps of officers, either military or civil, in which sense it is always written staffs The plural of wharf is generally written wharfs in England, in the United States it is more commonly, but improperly, written wharves, as it is also by some recent English writers. The plurals of hoof and turf, formerly written hooves and turves, are now written hoofs and turfs. The plurals of other nouns ending in f, fe, or ff, are formed regularly by the addition of s only.

§ 21. In the following nouns, the plural is distinguished from the singular only by a change of the vowel or vowel sound of the word: namely, man, men; woman, women; goose, geese; foot, feet; tooth, teeth; brother, brethren; louse, lice; mouse, mice. Compounds ending with these words form their plurals in the same manner: as, foeman, foemen; dormouse, dormice. Words which end in the syllable man, and are not compounds, form their plurals regularly, by adding s only: as, cayman, caymans; desman, desmans; firman, firmans; talisman, talismans; German, Germans; Mussulman, Mussulmans. The plurals of talisman and Mussulman are sometimes, by a gross blunder, written talismen, and Mussulmen.

§ 22. A few plurals end in en; namely, brother, brethren, child, children, ox, oxen. To these may be added the obsolete forms eyne, kine, shoon, hosen housen (from eye, cow, shoe, hose, house), the first three of which, though they have received a slightly different form, end, as pronounced, with the sound of n

§ 23. The words brother, die, pea, and penny, have each two plurals of different forms and with different significations as, brothers, male children of the same parent, also, members of the same society, association, class, or profession; brethren, members of the same religious or ecclesiastical body, the word in this form being rarely used except in religious writings, or in scriptural language, where it also has the same meaning that brother has in ordinary language, dies, implements for making impressions by stamping, or for making screws, also the cubical parts of pedestals. dice, the cubical blocks used in games of chance, peas, seeds of the pea-plant, when a definite number is mentioned, pease, the same in bulk, or spoken of collectively, pennies, the coins, especially when a definite number is mentioned, pence, the amount reckoned by these coins. See also these words in the Dictionary The word acquaintance is written, in the plural, either acquaintance (supposed to be a corruption of acquaintants) or acquaintances, the two forms having little or no difference of meaning.

§ 24 A few words, mostly names of animals, have the same form in the plural as in the singular, as, deer, sheep, trout, and the like.

§ 25. Many words adopted from foreign languages retain their original plurals as, datum, data; criterion, criteria, genus, genera, larva, larvæ crisis, crises; matrix, matrices; focus, foci, monsieur, messieurs.

Many words of this class, while retaining the original plurals, have also a second, formed after the analogy of English words of similar termination as, formula, formulæ or formulas, beau, beaux or beaus, index, indices, or indexes, stratum, strata or stratums, bandit, banditti or bandits, cherub, cherubim or cherubs, seraph, seraphim or seraphs. The plurals of the last two words are sometimes incorrectly written cherubims and seraphims, with double plural terminations, from ignorance or forgetfulness of the fact that in Hebrew words im is a plural ending

§ 26 In certain loose compounds consisting of a noun followed by an adjective or other qualifying expression, the plural is commonly formed by making the same change in the noun as when it stands alone as, court-martial, courts-martial, cousin german, cousins-german, son-in law, sons in law When, however, the adjective is so closely joined to the noun that the compound has the force of a simple word, the plural of the compound is commonly formed like that of any other word of the same termination as, cupful, cupfuls, handful, handfuls.

§ 27 There are many words, besides those mentioned in the preceding paragraphs, in respect to which usage, even that of the best authors, is variable The most important of these words are mentioned in this and the succeeding sections

The derivatives of the word villain, as villainous, villainy, &c., though often written villanous, villany, &c., properly retain the i, according to the practice of many writers, like those of other words similarly ending in ain: as, mountainous, from mountain, captaincy, from captain; and the like

The words connection, deflection, inflection, and reflection, follow the spelling of the words connect, deflect, inflect, and reflect, though often written, especially in England, connexion, deflexion, inflexion, and reflexion See Note under CONNECTION, in the Dictionary.

The word woe, though often written without the final e, should retain it, like most other nouns of one syllable and of similar form, as, doe, floe, foe, hoe, sloe, toe, and the like Monosyllables other than nouns, and words of more than one syllable, having a similar termination, omit the e as, do, go, no, so, canto, motto, potato

The words defense, expense, offense, and pretense are properly written thus, though often spelled with c instead of s, for the s belongs to the words from which they are derived, and is also used in all their derivatives See Note under OFFENSE, in the Dictionary.

The words drought and height were formerly written drouth and hight, and are still very often thus written in America

The verb practice is thus written like the noun, in preference to the form practise, though the latter spelling is used by many writers, especially in England. The difference in spelling between the noun and the verb is properly observed, in words of this kind, only in such as are accented on the last syllable, as device, devise See Note under PRACTISE, in the Dictionary.

Derivatives of the Greek ἕδρα (seat, base, side, pronounced hĕd'ra), as polyhedron, tetrahedron, octahedral, and the like, are properly thus written with h before the e of the termination, but are sometimes written polyedron, tetraëdron, octaëdral, &c., without the h

§ 28. There is a class of adjectives ending either in able or in ible, of which a large majority have the termination able, as, blamable, laudable, legible, mutable, navigable, vendible. Many of them are from Latin words ending in abilis or ibilis; some are from the French; and not a few are formed by adding the termination to English words. Those from Latin words end respectively in able or ible, according as they are derived from words ending in abilis or ibilis: as, mutable (Lat mutabilis); potable (Lat. potabilis); credible (Lat. credibilis), vendible (Lat. vendibilis). Those formed from English words generally end in able: as, avoidable, eatable, fordable, laughable, likable, salable, serviceable. There are a few words respecting which usage is variable. as, addible or addable; conversable or conversible; inferable or inferrible; referable or referrible.

§ 29. There is a class of words beginning with en or in, as enclose or inclose, enquire or inquire, ensure or insure, and the like, many of which take either form of the prefix indifferently. They are chiefly derived from the Latin, either directly or through the French, the prefix in belonging to the former language, and en to the latter. In some of these words, en is to be preferred, in others, in; in many of them, either may be used indifferently See the List of Words Spelled in Two or More Ways, and the different words of this class in the Dictionary

§ 30 There was formerly considerable diversity of usage in respect to the terminations ant and ent, both of which were, in certain cases, used almost indifferently, as in the words confidant or confident, dependant or dependent, and the like. Present usage, however, is definitely settled in favor of one or the other form, in nearly or quite every word of this class, though not always upon uniform principles In the few words in which both these terminations are retained, it is the more general practice to write the adjective with ent, and the common noun with ant, while the corresponding abstract noun ends in ence, as in the adjectives confident and dependent, the common nouns confidant and dependant, and the abstract nouns confidence and dependence In the case of very many words, however, the adjective ends in ant, as also the common noun, while the abstract noun ends in ance, as in the adjectives attendant and repentant, the common nouns attendant and repentant, and the abstract nouns attendance and repentance It may be remarked that the terminations ant and ance belong properly to words derived from the French or from Latin verbs of the first conjugation, ent and ence to words derived from Latin verbs of the other three conjugations. Ance and ance were also formerly confounded in some words, the one or the other being used indifferently.

§ 31. There is a class of words ending in er, some of which are written by most authors with the termination re, as, center, meter, theater, &c, which are often written centre, metre, theatre, &c Acre, chancre, lucre, nacre, massacre, and ogre, retain the termination re, in order to preserve the hard sound of the c and g.

§ 32 There are two classes of chemical words ending respectively, as more commonly written, in ide and ine, in regard to which usage has been variable Most of them were formerly written without the final e, but it is now the almost universal practice to retain it as, bromide, chloride, iodide, sulphide, chlorine, fluorine, saleine, stearine; and the like The word tannin is always written without the final e Oxide is now generally written with the termination ide, though formerly by many written oxyd, from the supposition that the y of the last syllable represented the υ of the Greek ὀξύς, from which the word is derived, whereas the last syllable is simply the same as the termination of the words bromide, sulphide, and the like See Note under OXIDE, in the Dictionary

§ 33 There is a class of words ending, as pronounced, with the sound of long i, followed by z, some of which are differently written, by different authors, with either ise or ize to represent this sound as, criticise or criticize, civilise or civilize, naturalise or naturalize, patronise or patronize These words are mostly verbs, and are chiefly derived from Greek words ending in ίζω, or from French words ending in iser or ise There are a few from other sources, but formed in analogy with those derived from these languages Those formed from Greek words have the termination ize, as, anathematize, characterize, dramatize, tantalize The words catechise and exorcise are exceptions Those formed in an analogous manner from English words are likewise written with ize, as, albumenize, bastardize, memorize, sensitize Those derived from the French verb prendre (participle pris or prise) end in ise, as, apprise, comprise, emprise, enterprise, surprise. Of those formed from French words other than prendre, or which have corresponding forms in the French, a majority end in ize, though in respect to some of them usage is variable, as, civilize, formalize, organize, satirize The following are the principal English verbs ending in ise, namely, advertise, advise, affranchise, apprise, catechise, chastise, circumcise, comprise, compromise, criticise, demise, despise, devise, disenfranchise, disfranchise, disguise, divertise, emprise, enfranchise, enterprise, exercise, exorcise, franchise, manumise, misprise, premise, reprise, revise, supervise, surmise, surprise It may be remarked that most of those in respect to which usage varies are more frequently written in England with the termination ise, and in the United States with the termination ize

§ 34 The words mold and molt, and their compounds and derivatives, are written in this Dictionary with o instead of ou, in analogy with the words bold, bolt, colt, gold, &c, from which the u has been dropped Most authors, however, write these words mould and moult, and their derivatives in like manner.

§ 35 There is a numerous class of words almost universally written, in the United States, with the termination or, many of which are written, in England, with the termination our; as, candor, favor, honor, labor, rumor, vigor English usage, however, is not uniform with respect to these words, many of them being written with or in English books See the Observations on Orthography, prefixed to these rules

§ 36 There is a small class of words ending with the syllable pea (from Lat. pes, pedis, foot), the termination of some of which was formerly, and is still frequently, written pede, as, biped, centiped, millped, palmiped, quadruped, soliped, and the like The words biped and quadruped are universally written without the final e, and the others, according to the best usage, should be written in the same manner.

A LIST OF WORDS SPELLED IN TWO OR MORE WAYS.

The design of the following List is, in the first place, to present those words in reference to which present usage, in the United States or in England, sanctions more than one method of spelling the same word; and, secondly, a considerable number of words, which, though not differently spelled by living reputable writers, yet are to be found in the orthography of the second column in the works of respectable authors of the last century, or the early part of the present century, and are, therefore, often presented to the eye of the modern reader. Such a list, it is thought, will be found very convenient for consultation. For any thing more full, a Glossary would be the appropriate resort. The first column, in the following List, presents the orthography recognized in the body of this Dictionary as the preferable one, or that in general use; the second column, one less desirable, or the usage of former times. Those forms in the second column which a good writer at the present day would not probably employ, but which are found only in writings of the past, have a dagger prefixed. One class of words which might properly have been added, is, from their great number, omitted. It is that of words of more than one syllable ending in ic or ick; as, music, musick, public, publick, &c. It is deemed sufficient to mention the class, and to state that the termination in ick is wholly disused. A similar remark is applicable to a portion of the words terminating formerly in our, now in or. Those of this class in the following List, in which both forms are given, are still sometimes used in both forms, the termination in or being that most favored in the United States, while our is the form generally preferred in England. Words of this class not given in the List are used only in or by living writers. Subject to a like remark is a class of words terminating in ise or ize, as, systematise or systematize, &c.,—the latter being the mode in which such words are spelled in America, and the former that affected by English printers. When in this List the word in the first column is followed by or, as, "Abatis, or Abattis," it is implied that the second form is nearly, often quite, in as good use as the first.

 In this Dictionary, words from foreign languages, both ancient and modern, are usually printed in Italics though many of them are not ordinarily so printed in other works, as, Landrark, Abaculus, Abandon

 Compound words, which, in ordinary writing and printing, have their constituent parts separated by a hyphen, are here distinguished from those which are usually and properly written and printed without one, by the use of a heavier hyphen than that employed for the mere division of words into syllables, as, Able-bodied Words having prefixes or initial syllables which are commonly separated from the other syllables by a hyphen, are distinguished in the same way, as, Re-enforce, Medico-legal.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

A. 1. The first letter of the alphabet in most of the known languages of the earth It is naturally the first letter, because it represents the first vocal sound naturally formed by the organs of speech, viz , that heard in far, mart, &c , being the sound uttered with a mere opening of the mouth without constraint, and without any effort to alter the natural position or configuration of the lips

A has, in English, two regular sounds, the "long," as in place, fate, and the "short," as in fat. Its occasional sounds are the "broad," as in wall, fall, the "Italian," as in father, and four others, as in fast, fare, what, many As the name of a letter of the alphabet, and when used emphatically as a noun or an article, it is always pronounced ā, but whenever it occurs as an unemphasized word in a purely English phrase, or forms or ends an unaccented syllable, its regular sound is that of a in far, somewhat shortened, but it is apt to lose this distinctive character, and to fall into a faint and obscure sound, like that of u in tub See Prin of Pron., §§ 2–8, 44, 45

2. An adjective, commonly called the indefinite article, and signifying one or any, but less emphatically. It is placed before nouns of the singular number denoting an individual object, before collective nouns, and also before plural nouns when the adjective few or the phrase great many is interposed, as, a dog, a house, a man, a hundred, a fleet, a regiment, a few persons, a great many days It is a contraction of the Anglo-Saxon an or ane, one, and is substituted for an, for the sake of euphony, before all words beginning with a consonant sound, except words beginning with the sound of h and having the accent on any other syllable than the first, as, a table, a woman, a year, a unit, a eulogy, a oneness, &c Formerly an was used both before vowels and consonants

In such expressions as "twenty leagues a day," "a hundred pounds a year," "a dollar a yard," &c , it denotes each, every See AN.

3. An obsolete and barbarous corruption of have, of he, and sometimes of I.

4 (Mus.) The nominal of the sixth tone in the model major scale (that in C), or of the first tone of the minor scale, which is named after it the scale in A minor. It is the sound of the second open string of the violin — A sharp (A ♯) is the name of a musical tone intermediate between A and B. — A flat (A ♭) is the name of a tone intermediate between A and G.

5. This letter serves as a prefix to many English words, as in asleep, afoot, afar, aground, a-going, a-saying, awake, a-c-knowledge In some cases, it is a contraction of the prepositions on, in, at, of, to, for; as in asleep for in sleep or on sleep, ablaze for in a blaze, aboard for on board, afoot for on foot, aground for on the ground, adays for on days, ado for to do, await for wait for. When used before participles or participial nouns, it admits of a similar explanation, as, a-hunting, in the act of hunting, a-going, in going, &c It was formerly placed before nouns without being joined to them as a prefix, as, "The world runs a wheels" [i e., on wheels]. B. Jonson — In other cases, it is contracted from the A-S. inseparable particle ge-, in O. H. German ga-, gi-, ka-, in Gothic ga-, which forms verbs from verbs, substantives, adjectives, and as a sort of augment to the past participle. In some cases, it only increases the force of the word, without any essential addition of meaning, as in afar. The original signification of this prefix is with, together, corresponding to the Latin com-, con-, co-; as in aware (Ger. gewahr, O. H. Ger. gewaro), acold, abide, abode, &c In some words of Greek origin, a is privative, giving to them a negative sense, as in abaptiston, q v before a vowel it becomes an, as in anonymous, from ἄνομα, name

In the Julian calendar, A is the first of the seven dominical letters

2 To give up absolutely, to forsake entirely, to renounce utterly, to relinquish all connection with, concern in, interest for, control of, or the like, to desert, to quit, to relinquish, to leave

Hope was overthrown, and yet could not be abandoned
J Taylor

3 Reflexively, to give one's self up without attempt at self control, to yield one's self unrestrainedly, — generally in a bad sense

4 (Mar Law) To relinquish to underwriters all claim to, — used of an insured person who gives up all claim to the property covered by the policy which may remain after loss or damage by a peril insured against.

Syn — To give up, yield, forego, cede, surrender, resign, abdicate, quit, relinquish renounce, desert, forsake, leave, retire, withdraw from — To ABANDON, DESERT, FORSAKE These words agree in representing a person as giving up or leaving some object, but differ as to the mode of doing it The distinctive sense of abandon is that of giving up a thing absolutely and finally, as if placed under a ban, as, to abandon one s friends or profession Crabb is wrong in saying that it is always used in a bad sense, since we speak of abandoning a hopeless enterprise, or abandoning a shipwrecked vessel The Latin original of desert was primarily applied to the case of deserters from military service Hence, the verb, when applied to persons in the active voice, has usually or always a bad sense, implying some breach of fidelity, honor, &c, as to desert one s colors, to desert one s post, to desert one s principles or duty When used in the passive, the sense is not necessarily bad, as, the fields were deserted, a deserted village, deserted halls Forsake is literally to seek forth and away from It therefore, as its distinctive sense, supposes previous union, as, the blood forsook his cheeks, or that the thing left had been familiar or frequented as, to forsake old friends, to forsake the paths of rectitude, &c It may be used either in a good or a bad sense

A băn'don, n 1 The act of abandoning or deserting, relinquishment [Obs]

2 One who abandons, or who is abandoned, one forsaken [Obs]

A bau don' (a ban dong'), n [Fr See supra] A complete giving up, hence, an utter disregard of self, arising from absorption in some favorite object or emotion, and sometimes a disregard of appearances, producing either careless negligence or unstudied ease of manner

A-băn'doned, p a Given up, as to a vice, hence, extremely wicked, or sinning without restraint, irreclaimably wicked, as, an abandoned youth, an abandoned villain

Syn — Forsaken, deserted, destitute abject, forlorn, profligate, corrupt vicious, depraved reprobate, wicked, heinous, criminal, vile, odious, detestable — ABANDONED, PROFLIGATE, REPROBATE These adjectives agree in expressing the idea of great personal depravity Profligate has reference to open and shameless immoralities, either in private life or political conduct, as, a profligate court, a profligate ministry

You are so witty profligate and thin,
At once we think thee Milton s Death and Sin
Epigram on Voltaire

Abandoned is stronger, and has reference to the searing of conscience and hardening of heart produced by a man s giving himself wholly up to iniquity as, an abandoned villain, a man of abandoned character Reprobate is still stronger, and describes the condition of one who is so entirely abandoned as to leave no hope of his recovery Thus, we speak of a person as "given over to a reprobate mind

A-băn'don ee', n. (Law.) One to whom any thing is abandoned

Gr βασσων, deeper, and W bas, shallow See BASE, a]

1 To lower or depress, to throw or cast down "To abase the eye" Bacon [Rare.]

His spear he 'gan abase Spenser

2 To cast down, to reduce low, to depress, to humble, to degrade, — applied chiefly to the passions, rank, office, and condition in life

Whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased Matt xxii 12

Syn — To depress, humble, degrade, bring low, debase, cast down — To ABASE, DEBASE, DEGRADE These words agree in the idea of bringing down from a higher to a lower state Abase has reference to a bringing down in condition or feelings, as, to abase the proud to abase one s self before God Debase has reference to the bringing down of a thing in purity, or making it base It is, therefore, always used in a bad sense, as, to debase the coin of the kingdom, to debase the mind by vicious indulgence, to debase one s style by coarse or vulgar expressions Degrade has reference to a bringing down from some higher grade or degree of elevation Thus, a priest is degraded from the clerical office When used in a moral sense, it denotes a bringing down in character and just estimation, as degraded by intemperance, a degrading employment, &c In geology, degrade has the sense of bringing down physically, as, the rocks were degraded by the action of the elements — The nouns abasement debasement, degradation, follow the distinctions of their verbs as given above

A-bāsed' (bāst'), p a (Her) Turned downward, — used of certain armorial bearings, when turned downward toward the point of the shield Chambers

A-bāse'ment, n [Fr abaissement, Pr abaissament] The act of abasing, humbling, or bringing low, the state of depression, degradation, or humiliation.

A-bāsh', v. t. [imp & p p ABASHED, p pr & vb n ABASHING] [Formed like to base, from the Fr abaisser, and like to bash, from baisser Anciently it was written abais, abaish, abaysch, p abaist, abaishshed, abayschid] To destroy the self possession of, to cast down the countenance of to make ashamed, to confuse or confound as by exciting suddenly a consciousness of guilt, error, inferiority, and the like

Abashed the devil stood,
And felt how awful goodness is Milton

Syn. — To confuse, confound, disconcert shame — To ABASH, CONFUSE CONFOUND Abash is a stronger word than confuse but not so strong as confound We are abashed when struck either with sudden shame or with a humbling sense of inferiority as, Peter was abashed by the look of his Master So a modest youth is abashed in the presence of those who are greatly his superiors We are confused when, from some unexpected or startling occurrence, we lose clearness of thought and self-possession Thus, a witness is often confused by a severe cross-examination, a timid person is apt to be confused in entering a room full of strangers We are confounded when our minds are overwhelmed, as it were, by something wholly unexpected, amazing, dreadful &c, so as to have nothing to say Thus, a criminal is usually confounded at the discovery of his guilt

Satan stood
Awhile as mute, confounded what to say Milton

The Armot absconds in winter Ray

Ab-scond', v. t. To hide or conceal [Rare] Bentley

Ab scond'ance, n Concealment Phillips

Ab scond'er, n One who absconds

Ab'sence, n [Lat absentia, Fr absence, Pr. ab sencia, absensa. See ABSENT]

1 A state of being absent or withdrawn from a place or from companionship

The advantage of his absence took the king Shak.

2 Want, destitution "In the absence of conventional law" Kent

3 Inattention to things present heedlessness "Reflecting on the little absences and distractions of mankind" Addison

To conquer that abstraction which is called absence Landor

Ab'sent, a [Fr & Pr absent, Lat absens, p pr of absum, abesse, to be away from, from ab and sum, esse, to be]

1 Withdrawn from, or not present in, a place "Expecting absent friends" Shak.

2 Inattentive to what is passing, heedless.

What is commonly called an absent man is commonly either a very weak or a very affected man Chesterfield

Syn. — ABSENT, ABSTRACTED These words both imply a want of attention to surrounding objects, but for different causes We speak of a man as absent when his thoughts wander from present scenes or topics of discourse, we speak of him as abstracted when his mind (usually for a brief period) is strongly drawn off to some remote object or train of thought, and is thus prevented from giving attention to what is going on around him Absence of mind is usually the result of loose habits of thought, abstraction commonly arises either from engrossing interests and cares, or unfortunate habits of association

Ab sĕnt', v. t [imp & p p. ABSENTED, p pr & vb n ABSENTING]

1 To take or withdraw to such a distance as to prevent intercourse, — used with the reciprocal pronoun

If after due summons any member absents himself, he is to be fined Addison

2 To cause the absence of [Rare] "Go — for thy stay not free, absents thee more" Milton

Ab'so lūte (30), a [Lat absolutus, p p of absolvere, Fr absolu, Pr absolut See ABSOLVE]

1. Completed, or regarded as complete, finished, perfect, total, as, absolute perfection, absolute beauty.

So absolute she seems,
And in herself complete Milton

2. Freed or loosed from any limitation or condition, uncontrolled, unconditional, as, absolute authority, and absolute monarchy, an absolute promise or command.

3. Positive, clear, certain. [Rare]

The color of my hair he can not tell,
Or answers, dark at random, white, be sure,
He's absolute on the figure, five or ten,
Of my last subscription Mrs Browning

4. Authoritative, peremptory. [Rare]

The peddler stopped, and tapped her on the head,
With absolute forefinger, brown and ringed Mrs Browning

5. Loosed from, or unconnected by, dependence on any other being, self existent, self sufficing

☞ In this sense God is called the Absolute by the Theist The term is also applied by the Pantheist to the universe, or the total of all existence, as only capable of relations in its parts to each other and to the whole, and as dependent for its existence and its phenomena on its mutually depending forces and their laws

6 Capable of being thought or conceived by itself alone, unconditioned, unrelated

☞ It is in dispute among philosophers whether the term, in this sense, is not applied to a mere logical fiction or abstraction, or whether the Absolute, as thus defined, can be known or apprehended by the human intellect — "To Cusa we can indeed articulately trace, word and thing, the recent philosophy of the Absolute" Sir Wm Hamilton

7 (Chem) Pure, unmixed, as, absolute alcohol

8 (Gram) Not immediately dependent on the other parts of the sentence in government, as, the case absolute.

Absolute equation (Astron), the sum of the optic and eccentric equations — Absolute terms (Alg), such as are known or which do not contain the unknown quantity Davies & Peck — Absolute space (Physics) space considered without relation to material objects or limits Davies & Peck

Ab-sŏrb' (25), v t [imp & p p. ABSORBED, p pr & vb n ABSORBING] [Lat absorbere, from ab and sorbere, to suck in, draw in, Fr absorber]

1 To drink in, to suck up, to imbibe, as a sponge, or as the lacteals of the body Bacon

2 Hence, to swallow up, or overwhelm, to engross or engage wholly, as, absorbed in study or the pursuit of wealth

3 To take up by cohesive, chemical, or any molecular action, as when charcoal absorbs gases So heat, light, and electricity are absorbed or taken up in the substances into which they pass Nichol.

Syn. — To ABSORB, ENGROSS, SWALLOW UP, ENGULF These words agree in one general idea, that of completely taking up They are chiefly used in a figurative sense, and may be distinguished by a reference to their etymology We speak of a person as absorbed (lit, drawn in as by a whirlpool) in study or some other employment of the highest interest We speak of a person as engrossed (lit, seized upon in the gross, or wholly) by something which occupies his whole time and thoughts, as the acquisition of wealth, or the attainment of honor We speak of a person (under a stronger image) as swallowed up and lost in that which completely occupies his thoughts and feelings, as in grief at the death of a friend or in the multiplied cares of life We speak of a person as engulfed in that which (like a gulf) takes in all his hopes and interests, as, engulfed in misery, engulfed in ruin

Lethean gulfs receive them as they fall,
And dark oblivion soon absorbs them all Cowper.

Too long hath love engrossed Britannia's stage,
And sunk to softness all our tragic rage Tickell.

Should not the sad occasion swallow up
All other cares! Addison

And in destruction's river
Engulf and swallow up Sir J Sidney

Ăb'stract (8) nop , § 130), a [Lat abstractus, Fr abstrait, Pr abstrait See supra]

1. Distinct from something else, separate

2 Withdrawn from the concrete, or from particulars, separate, as, an abstract subject, hence, difficult, abstruse, refined. Locke

A concrete name is a name which stands for a thing; an abstract name is a name which stands for an attribute of a thing A practice has grown up in more modern times, which, it not introduced by Locke, has gained currency from his example, of applying the expression "abstract name" to all names which are the result of abstraction and generalization, and consequently to all general names, instead of confining it to the names of attributes J S Mill

An abstract idea (Metaph), an idea separated from a complex object, or from other ideas which naturally accompany it, as the solidity of marble when contemplated apart from its color or figure — Abstract terms, those which express abstract ideas, as beauty, whiteness, roundness, without regarding any subject in which they exist, or abstract terms are the names of orders, genera, or species of things, in which there is a combination of similar qualities — Abstract numbers (Math), numbers used without application to things, as 8, 8, 10, but when applied to any thing, as 6 feet 10 men, they become concrete — Abstract or pure mathematics, that branch of mathematics which treats of magnitude or quantity, without restriction to any particular species of magnitude, as arithmetic and geometry,—opposed to mixed mathematics, which treats of ample properties, and the relations of quantity, as applied to sensible objects, as hydrostatics, navigation, optics, &c

Ăb'stract, n. 1. That which comprises or concentrates in itself the essential qualities of a larger thing, or of several things, specifically, an inventory, summary, or epitome, as of a treatise, book. "An abstract of every treatise he had read " Watts.

Man the abstract

Ab-străct'ed-ly, adv In an abstracted manner

Ab străct'ed ness, n The state of being abstracted Baxter

Ab străct'er, n One who abstracts, or makes an abstract

Ab străc'tion (-străk'shun), n [N. Lat abstractio, Fr abstraction]

1 The act of abstracting or separating, or the state of being separated

2 (Metaph) The act or process of leaving out of consideration one or more properties of a complex object, so as to attend to others, analysis Thus, when the mind considers the form of a tree by itself, or the color of the leaves as separate from their size or figure, the act is called abstraction. So, also, when it considers whiteness, softness, virtue, existence, as separate from any particular objects.

☞ Abstraction is necessary to classification, by which things are arranged in genera and species We separate in idea the qualities of certain objects, which are of the same kind, from others which are different in each, and arrange the objects having the same properties in a class, or collected body

Abstraction is no positive act it is simply the negative of attention Sir Wm Hamilton

3 An idea or notion of an abstract, or theoretical nature, as, to fight for mere abstractions

4 A separation from worldly objects, a recluse life, as, a hermit's abstraction

5 Absence of mind, inattention to present objects, heedlessness

4 The custom or prerogative of being admitted [Obs] "Sir John, you are a gentleman of excellent breeding, of great admittance" Shak.

5 (Law) The act of giving possession of a copyhold estate Bouvier.

Syn.—Admission, access; entrance, initiation —ADMITTANCE, ADMISSION These words are, to some extent, in a state of transition and change Admittance is now chiefly confined to its primary sense of access into some locality or building Thus we see on the doors of factories, &c, "No admittance" Its secondary or moral sense, as "admittance to the church," is almost entirely laid aside Admission has taken to itself the secondary or figurative senses, as, admission to the rights of citizenship admission to the church, the admissions made by one of the parties in a dispute And even when used in its primary sense, it is not identical with admittance Thus, we speak of admission into a country, territory, and other larger localities, &c, where admittance could not be used So, when we speak of admission to a concert or other public assembly, the meaning is not perhaps exactly that of admittance, viz, access within the walls of the building, but rather a reception into the audience or access to the performances But the lines of distinction on this subject are not fully drawn

Till the great plover's human whistle amazed
Her heart, and glancing round the waste, she feared
In every waving brake an ambuscade. Tennyson.

Syn.—To astonish, confound, perplex —To AMAZE, ASTONISH We are amazed at what is incomprehensible, we are astonished at what is great or striking in a high degree Both words express surprise and wonder, each, however, under its peculiar relations Both may be used in a good sense, as applied to what gives us a high degree of pleasure, or in a bad sense, when applied to persons or things which we regard with strong disgust or reprobation In deciding which to use, we are to be governed by the etymology, and there are cases in which either word may be employed, though of course in a different sense Thus we may speak of being amazed, and of being astonished, at the bounties of Providence, or the rich provisions of divine grace, according to the emotion which we wish to indicate as awakened by these objects. We may be amazed at a man's folly when we can not account for his being betrayed into it, we may be astonished at it when struck with wonder at its enormity When the Duke of Bedford reproached Lord Thurlow in the House of Lords, as a mere lawyer who had recently been elevated to the peerage, the Lord Chancellor exclaimed, "I am amazed, my lords, I am amazed at his Grace's speech He can not look before him, or behind him, or on either side of him, without seeing some noble peer who owes his seat in this house to his successful exertions in the profession to which I belong" When Lord Suffolk, in the same body, proposed to employ American savages to carry on the war against the colonies, Lord Chatham broke forth "I am astonished to hear such principles expressed, I am shocked to hear them avowed in this house or in this country" In each case, the word chosen exactly represented the emotions awakened in the speaker's mind

A'nal, a [Lat anus] Pertaining to, or situated near, the anus, as, the anal fin Pennant.

A năl'çime, n [Fr analcime, N Lat analcimus, from Gr a priv and ἄλκιμος, strong, from ἀλκή, strength] (Min) A white or flesh red mineral, of the zeolite family, occurring in twenty four-sided crystals, and sometimes in cubes By friction, it acquires a weak electricity, hence its name Dana.

An'a lĕc'tic, An'a lĕc'ta, a. Collecting or selecting, made up of selections, as, an analectic magazine

An'a-lĕc'ta, An'a lĕc'tos, n pl. [Gr ἀναλεκτα, from ἀνάλεγειν, to collect, from ανα, up, and λέγειν, to gather.] A collection of literary fragments

An'a lem'ma, n. [Lat analemma, a sun-dial on a pedestal, showing the latitude and meridian of a place, Gr. ἀναλημμα, a support, or thing supported, from ἀναλαμβανειν, to take up, from ανα, up, and λαμβανειν, to take]

1 (Geom) A projection of the sphere on the plane of the meridian, orthographically made by straight lines, circles, and ellipses, the eye being supposed at an infinite distance, and in the east or west points of the horizon

2 An instrument of wood or brass, on which this projection of the sphere is made, and having a horizon fitted to it,—formerly much used in solving astronomical problems, such as finding the time of the sun's rising and setting, the length and hour of the day, &c

3 A tabular mark, usually in the shape of the figure 8, depicted across the torrid zone on an artificial terrestrial globe, to notify the sun's declination on any day in the year. Francis.

An'a-lĕp'sis, n. [Gr. ἀνάληψις, a taking up, or again, recovery, from ἀναλαμβάνειν, to take up. See supra.] (Med) Recovery of strength after a disease. Quincy.

An'a-lĕp'sy, n. A species of epileptic attack, of sudden occurrence, but not regarded as dangerous.

An'a-lĕp'tic, a. [Gr ἀναληπτικός, restorative. See supra] Corroborating, invigorating; giving strength after disease, as, analeptic medicines. Quincy.

An'a-lĕp'tic, n. A medicine which gives strength, and aids in restoring the body to health after sickness, a restorative

A-năl'o-gal, a. Analogous. [Obs.] Hale.

An'a-lŏj'ic-al, a. [See ANALOGOUS.]

1. Founded on, or directed by, analogy.

We have words which are proper and not analogical Reid

2 Having analogy, analogous. [Obs.] "Something analogical to either" Hale

An'a-lŏj'ic-al-ly, adv In an analogical or analogous manner, by way of similitude, relation, or agreement.

A prince is analogically styled a pilot, being to the state as a pilot is to the vessel Berkeley

An'a-lŏj'ic al-ness, n. The quality of being analogical Johnson

A-năl'o-gism, n [Gr. ἀναλογισμός, course of reasoning, from ἀναλογίζεσθαι, to think over, to calculate]

1 (Logic) An argument from the cause to the effect, an a priori argument Johnson

2 Investigation of things by the analogy they bear to each other Crabb

A năl'o gist, n One who adheres to analogy

A năl'o gize, v. t [Gr ἀναλογίζεσθαι] To explain by analogy, to form some resemblance between, to consider with regard to its analogy to something else Cheyne

•A năl'o gous [Gr ἀνάλογον] See ANALOGUE

A năl'o gous, a [Lat analogus, Gr ἀνάλογος, according to a due ratio, proportionate, from ἀνα, according to, and λόγος, ratio, proportion]

1 Having analogy, corresponding to something else, bearing some resemblance or proportion,—followed by to

Analogous tendencies in arts and manners De Quincey

2 (Chem) Closely similar, but differing in some approximate degree as to each of the more prominent characters Dana

Syn.—Correspondent, similar like

A năl'o gous-ly, adv In an analogous manner.

An'a-lŏgue (ăn'a lŏg), n [Fr, from Gr ἀνάλογος]

1 An analogous word or thing Pritchard

Look out among these four visages for the nearest analogue you can find for each I Taylor

The vexatious tyranny of the individual despot meets its analogue in the insolent tyranny of the many I Taylor

2 Specifically, (Nat Hist) (a) An organ which is equivalent in its functions to a different organ in another species or group, or even in the same group as, the gill of a fish is the analogue of a lung in a quadruped, although the two are not of like structural relations (b) A species in one genus or group having its characters parallel, one by one, with those of another group that is, the two approximate in the special generic or group distinctions (c) A species or genus in one country closely related to a species of the same genus, or a genus of the same group, in another such species are often called representative species, and such genera, representative genera Dana

A năl'o gy, n [Lat analogia, Gr ἀναλογία, from ἀνάλογος See ANALOGOUS]

1 An agreement or likeness between things in some circumstances or effects, when the things are otherwise entirely different Thus, learning enlightens the mind, because it is to the mind what light is to the eye, enabling it to discover things before hidden.

☞ When both the things which have an analogy follow a preposition that preposition must be between or betwixt, as, there is an analogy between plants and animals, or between customs When one of the things precedes a verb, and the other follows, the preposition used must be to or with as a plant has some analogy to or with an animal Analogy is not unfrequently used to denote mere similarity But its specific meaning is a similarity of relations and in this consists the difference between the argument from example and that from analogy In the former we argue from the mere similarity of two things, in the latter, from the similarity of their relations Karslake

2. (Geom) Equality, proportion, or similarity of ratios Hutton

3 (Gram) Conformity of words to the genius, structure, or general rules of a language, similarity of origin, inflection, or principle of pronunciation, and the like, as opposed to anomaly Johnson

A năl'y sis, n, pl ANALYSES [Gr ἀνάλυσις, from ἀναλύειν, to unloose, to dissolve, to resolve into its elements, from ἀνα, again, and λύειν, to loose]

1 A resolution of any thing, whether an object of the senses or of the intellect, into its constituent or original elements, an examination of the component parts of a subject, each separately, as the words which compose a sentence, the tones of a tune, or the simple propositions which enter into an argument It is opposed to synthesis.

2 Hence, (a) A syllabus, or table of the principal heads of a continued discourse, disposed in their natural order (b) A brief, methodical illustration of the principles of a science. In this sense it is nearly synonymous with synopsis. (c) (Chem) The separation of a compound by chemical processes into its constituents, as, an analysis of water, of air, &c. (d) (Logic) The tracing of things to their source, and the resolving of knowledge into its original principles. (e) (Math) The resolving of problems by reducing them to equations

Ultimate analysis (Chem), a resolution of a compound substance into its elements — Proximate analysis, a determination of the proximate principles, or compounds, in a compound,—used especially with reference to organic substances — Qualitative analysis, a determination simply of the ingredients present — Quantitative analysis, a determination of the proportions of the ingredients or constituents — Volumetric analysis, a method of quantitative analysis, in which re-agents of a standard strength are employed Dana

An'a lyst, n [Fr analyste See supra] One who analyzes, or is versed in analysis Kirwan

An'a lyt'ic, } a [Gr ἀναλυτικός. See ANALYSIS [See Note under MATHEMATICS]

1 An iron instrument for holding a ship or other vessel at rest in water It consists of a straight bar called a shank, having at one end a transverse bar called a stock, above which is a ring for the cable, and at the other end two or more arms with flukes forming a suitable angle with the shank to enter the ground Brande

☞ Anchors are of different sizes The largest and strongest and that on which most dependence is placed, is the sheet anchor Then come the best bower, the small bower (so called from being carried on the bows), the spare anchor, the stream anchor, and the kedge anchor which is the smallest Totten

2 Hence, any contrivance or instrument designed to hold fast, as an arrangement of timber to hold a dam fast, a contrivance to hold the end of a bridge cable, or other similar part, a contrivance used by founders to hold the cone of a mold in place

3 (Fig) That which gives stability or security, that on which we place dependence for safety "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast" Heb vi 19

4. (Arch) Carved work, somewhat resembling an anchor, — commonly a part of the ornaments of the boultins of capitals in the Tuscan, Doric, and Ionic orders, and on the moldings of cornices.

5 (Her) An emblem of hope

The anchor comes home, when it is dislodged from its bed, so as to drag from the violence of the wind, sea, or current — Foul anchor, when the anchor hooks, or is entangled with another anchor, or with a wreck or cable, or when the slack cable is entangled — The anchor is a-cockbill, when it is suspended perpendicularly from the cat-head, ready to be let go — The anchor is a-peak, when it is drawn in so tight as to bring the ship directly over it. — The anchor is a-trip, or a-weigh, when it is just drawn out of the ground, in a perpendicular direction, either by the cable or the buoy-rope — To back an anchor, to lay down a small anchor ahead of that by which the ship rides, with the cable fastened to the crown of the latter to prevent its coming home. — At anchor, when a ship rides by her anchor. — To cast anchor, or to anchor, to let go an anchor to keep a ship at rest. — To weigh anchor, to heave or raise the anchor out of the ground.

Ăp'o lŏgue (ăp'o log), n [Fr. apologue, Lat. apologus, Gr. ἀπόλογος, story, tale, fable, from ἀπο, from, and λόγος, speech, λεγειν, to speak.] A story or relation of fictitious events, intended to convey useful truths, a moral fable.

☞ An apologue differs from a parable in this: the parable is drawn from events which take place among mankind, and therefore requires probability in the narrative, the apologue is founded on supposed actions of brutes or inanimate things, and therefore is not limited by strict rules of probability. Æsop's fables are good examples of apologues.

A-pŏl'o-gy, n [Fr. apologie, Lat. apologia, Gr. ἀπολογία, from ἀπό and λόγος. See APOLOGETIC.]

1. Something said or written in defense or justification of what appears to others wrong or unjustifiable, or of what may be liable to disapprobation, as, Tertullian's Apology for Christianity.

2. An acknowledgment intended as an extenuation of some improper or injurious remark or act, an excuse.

It is not my intention to make an apology for my poem: some will think it needs no excuse, and others will receive none. Dryden

Syn.—EXCUSE. An apology, in the original sense of the word, was a pleading off from some charge or imputation, by explaining and defending one's principles or conduct. It therefore amounted to a vindication. One who now offers an apology, admits himself to have been, at least apparently, in the wrong; but brings forward some palliating circumstance or tenders a frank acknowledgment, by way of reparation. We make an apology for some breach of propriety or decorum (like rude expressions, unbecoming conduct, &c.) or some deficiency in what might be reasonably expected. We offer an excuse when we have been guilty of some breach or neglect of duty, and we do it by way of extenuating our fault and with a view to be forgiven. When an excuse has been accepted, an apology may still in some cases be necessary or appropriate. An excuse is not grounded on the claim of innocence, but is rather an appeal for favor resting on some collateral circumstance. An apology mostly respects the conduct of individuals toward each other; it is equitable; it is a voluntary act produced by feelings of decorum or a desire for the good opinion of others. Crabb.

A-pŏl'o-gy, v. i. To offer an apology or excuse; to account. [Obs.]

1. A person sent forth or deputed to execute some important business; specifically, one of the twelve disciples of Christ sent forth to preach the gospel.

☞ The title of apostle is also applied to others, who, though not of the number of the twelve, were equal with them in office and authority; as Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, and Barnabas his fellow-laborer. In Heb. iii. 1 the name is given to Christ himself, as having been sent from heaven to publish the gospel. In the primitive ages of the church other ministers were called apostles (1 Cor. xvi. 7) as were persons sent to carry alms from one church to another (Philip. ii. 25). This title has also been given to persons who first planted the Christian faith in different parts of the world, and to those who have initiated any great moral reform, or first advocated any important belief. Thus Dionysius of Corinth is called the apostle of France, and John Eliot the apostle to the Indians and Theobald Matthew the apostle of Temperance. The Jesuit missionaries are called apostles.

Syn.—To APPRECIATE, ESTIMATE, ESTEEM Estimate is an act of judgment, esteem is an act of valuing or prizing, and when applied to individuals, denotes a sentiment of moral approbation See ESTIMATE. Appreciate lies between the two As compared with estimate, it supposes a union of sensibility with judgment, producing a nice and delicate perception As compared with esteem, it denotes a valuation of things according to their appropriate and distinctive excellence, and not simply their moral worth Thus, with reference to the former of these (delicate perception) an able writer says, "Women have a truer appreciation of character than men, and another remarks, 'It is difficult to appreciate the true force and distinctive sense of terms which we are every day using So, also, we speak of the difference between two things, as sometimes hardly appreciable With reference to the latter of these senses (that of valuation as the result of a nice perception) we say 'It requires a peculiar cast of character to appreciate the poetry of Wordsworth "He who has no delicacy himself, can not appreciate it in others,' "The thought of death is salutary because it leads us to appreciate worldly things aright' Appreciate is much used in cases where something is in danger of being overlooked or undervalued, as when we speak of appreciating the difficulties of a subject, or the risk of an undertaking So Lord Plunket referring to an 'ominous silence' which prevailed among the Irish peasantry says, 'If you know how to appreciate that silence it is more formidable than the most clamorous opposition In like manner a person who asks some favor of another is apt to say 'I trust you will appreciate my motives in this request Here we have the key to a very frequent use of the word It is hardly necessary to say that appreciate looks on the favorable side of things We never speak of appreciating a man's faults but his merits This idea of rending things favorably appears more fully in the word appreciative as when we speak of an appreciative audience or an appreciative review meaning one that manifests a quick perception and a ready valuation of excellence

Ap prē'ci āte, v. t To rise in value to become of more value as, the coin of the country appreciates public securities appreciated when the debt was funded [In Americanism.]
